 Upon the day when thou wast born,
 Mirth and music surely met.
 There's such a glory in thine eyes,
 Such sweet music in thy tone,
 That the very singing birds
 Well might claim it for their own.

Lovely lady, gentle lady,
 Lady with the beaming eye,
 Will the hours of all thy life
 Ever thus go laughing by?
 Will no sorrow cloud thy soul,
 Will no care disturb thy breast?
 Or will gentle dreams or fancies
 Ever lull thee to thy rest?

Lovely lady, gentle lady,
 Lady with the joyous air,
 Softly may Time's withering hand
 Touch a brow so loved and fair.
 Smile to-day, and smile to-morrow,
 Smile the hours away,
 Every smile is stol'n from sorrow—
 Oh! be happy while you may!

TO MISS C. B.

I know a maid of fairy mould—
 Her hair is like the shining gold;
 Her cheek is like a rosy shell;
 Her lip, a flower-cup's crimson cell:
 Oh! not a lovelier maid is seen
 Than she, the maid of fairy mien.

Yet 'tis not that her starry eyes
 Are bright as evening's humid skies,
 That softly through each clinging curl
 Looks out a brow of snowy pearl—
 It is not this that hath arrayed
 With such a charm that lovely maid.

It is, that in those soft bright eyes
 A soul enshrined in beauty lies;
 It is, that gentle tones and words,
 Like melodies of singing birds,
 And loving deed, and loving thought,
 A deeper spell than these have wrought.

AN ALPINE EVENING.*

BY EARLE J. GOODRICH.

THE sun's golden tints gild the Alps' topmost height,
 And gleam through the darkness that chases the light
 From vale up to mount, and the textureless pall
 Of Silence is flung o'er cottage and hall;
 When, soft floating down, tones of sweetest accord
 Load the air with an anthem of praise to the Lord.

From cottage to cottage, thy bleak hills among,
 The tribute is sounded by every glad tongue;
 The homage of man, at the still evening hour,
 Is paid to the Being of mercy and power:
 And, floating all round, tones of sweetest accord
 Swell the air with an anthem of praise to the Lord.

Man's homage hath ceased; but Nature prolongs
 His burden of praises, and echoes his songs;
 The grottoes and caves, where thy heroes have trod,
 Join man in his tribute of glory to God;
 From valley and height, tones of holy accord
 Bear nightly to heaven earth's praise to the Lord.

* I have somewhere read that, as the last rays of the setting sun rest upon the highest peak of the Alps, it is customary for the shepherds to sound upon their horns "Praise to the Lord!" The phrase is repeated by the head of each family; and the caves resound the echo long after man's voice has ceased.

ANNA'S COTTAGE.

BY LELIA MORTIMER.

I AM thinking of the cottage
Where my gentle Anna dwells;
Of the wind that through the forest
In its lulling music swells;
Of the little rill that murmurs
At the garden's grassy foot,
And the thousand meek-eyed flowers
'Mid the velvet moss that shoot.

I am thinking of the maple,
With its thick and trembling leaves;
Of the light wreath 'neath its branches
That the golden sunlight weaves
And of lowly whispered music
At the quiet hour of even,
When the stars with holy glances
Look from out the azure heaven.

I am thinking of the arbor
Down amid the drooping flowers—
And among the bending willows
Of the vine-clad, shady bowers;
Of the footpath gently winding
Round each low and mossy bed,
And the moon-beams that at evening
O'er the dewy buds are shed.

I am thinking of the rose-tree
Climbing up the snow-white walls,
And among the green leaves peeping
Swelling buds and crimson balls;
Of the ivy o'er the trellis,
With its tendrils soft and clinging,
And amid the leafy curtains
Golden birds their low notes singing.

I am thinking, I am thinking
Of a slight and fairy form—
Of a cheek now pale, now blushing,
And of lips all red and warm—
Of a brow of pearly whiteness,
And of eyes of deepest blue,
Meek and gentle as a dovelet's,
Starry bright, and soft and true:

And of tresses brown and golden,
Floating out upon the air,
Like a pile of brilliant sunbeams,
Bright and gloriously fair!
Of a voice whose softest murmur
Is like waters creeping o'er Clustering flowers, whose waxen leaflets
Bend below the grassy shore!

I am thinking of a window,
'Neath whose curtain pure and white—
Just where peeps the earliest day-dawn,
Shedding soft and rosy light—
Stands a chair with pale, soft cushions,
Sits a slight form, weary, worn,
From whose path the buds and blossoms
By rude fingers have been torn.

On the soft brow faintly linger
Touches of life's early bloom,
Though Time's pencil there hath painted
Shadows breathing of the tomb.

Snowy white the long, thin tresses
Back from that pale forehead lie
While the sunlight, dim but gentle
Glimmers from the sunken eye.

'Tis a mother's brow that lightens
'Neath a daughter's loving face;
'Tis a mother's eye that brightens
At her fond and warm embrace.
And those pale and weary fingers
Nightly clasp above the head,
Bound in beauty like a flow'ret,
On its green and dewy bed.

I am thinking of the maple
Bending o'er the cottage door;
Of the streamlet, and the rose-tree
The low window climbing o'er;
Of the pale one in its shadow,
And the fairy ever by,
With her tones of lulling music,
And her hopeful, heaven-blue eye.

ELSIBARDO.

BY JESSE BLONE.

WHERE the Rhine enlaps the vineyards,
And hills with columns towered:
Where the vales wear summer vestments,
Like bride with beauty dowered—
Dwells the lord of Elisbarado,
In his castle on the steep,
Where the eagle builds his eyrie—
Where the vulture proudly sweeps.

When the moon down in the river
Finds a mirror clear and cold,
And the countless stars in heaven
Have unveiled their eyes of gold,
Does the lord of Elisbarado
Range the crags and valleys deep,
Where the fountains in the moonlight
Their unceasing murmur keep.

With his mantle wrapped around him,
And his unshorn hair in flow,
Does he gaze from off the highland
On the vale and streams below;
And the simple peasant, turning
From the vintage to his cot,
Shuns the hill of Elisbarado
As a wizard-haunted spot.

Wherefore frowns Lord Elisbarado
Whene'er shrilly at the gate
Calls the horse of weary horseman
As the day is waning late?
Ah! his soul is steeped in venom,
And his heart o'erflows with gall,
For his memory holds before him
The dark day of Wendefall:

Which beclouded o'er his boyhood
Like a heavy pall of years,
For it left him lone and lonely,
Yet a heritage of tears;
And 'tis hid within his bosom,
Like a serpent 'mid the flowers—
But it dwains upon his vision
In the nightly watchful hours.

Morning shines on Elisbardo,
And a gay and laughing train,
That is circling up the highland
From the smiling flow'ry plain;
And the sun lights up the shimmer
And the sheen of peaceful spears,
With the proudly prancing horses
Bearing gallant cavaliers.

'Tis the bride of Elisbardo,
With the lilies in her hair,
That was visioned in the valley
To her pallid lover there;
And who now is sadly gazing
To discern beyond the hill
But one glance of her whose presence
Ever made his bosom thrill.

But alas for Elisbardo,
And the maiden bending low,
Who is wedded to his life-grief,
To his agony and woe!
And her youthful cheek is pallid
As the lilies in her hair:
Ay, the heart of Elisbardo
Has a partner in despair

THE LITTLE GIRL'S INQUIRIES.

BY LILLIAN.

"Oh, mother," said a laughing girl,
With rosy cheeks and mild blue eye,
Upon whose forehead many a curl
Was nestling, tinged with auburn dye—

"Oh, mother, see the azure sky,
Archling itself so sweet above,
As if it, from some danger nigh,
Would shield me with its look of love.
On towering hills it seems to rest;
But, if I go to yonder hill,
I'm by the same sweet smiles caressed;
It arches thus above me still!
You told me the Almighty One
Spread out this glorious canopy,
And blessed the work when it was done;
But was it made alone for me?"

"And, mother, see—oh, see the sun!
And oh, 'tis such a glorious thing
I fain, when radiant day is done,
Would follow on some borrowed wing!
For, when it sinks behind yon hill,
How soothing seems its farewell ray!
As if 'twould gladly have me still Behold it on its long, long way!
And when, as comes the blushing morn,
It sheds abroad its golden light,
And glories everywhere are born,
As recompense for weary night,
It peeps my little window through,
And softly opens my long-closed eyes,
As if it had its loveliest hue
Put on to make me glad to rise;
And ever, ever through the day
How bright it seems to smile on me!
Or, if dark clouds obstruct its ray,
Brighter it shines when from them free.

You say the same Almighty hand,
Dear mother, caused the sun to be,
And now it shines at his command;
But does it shine alone for me?

"And then the silver moon—the stars,
Those ever sparkling gems of heaven,
Whose rays, when night their way unbars
To cheer its dreariness are given!
And whencesoe'er I've looked on them,
So beautiful and bright they've shone,
Gilding night's sable diadem,
They seemed to beam for me alone!
Mother, they say they're angels' eyes,
That slumber not when we're asleep;
That they're the watchmen of the skies,
And their appointed vigils keep;
And never weary at their post,
Beaming so bright and lovingly.
But, mother, does that shining host
Watch all the night alone for me?"

"And, mother, whencesoe'er I go,
So gayly all things seem to smile,
There is no joy I need to know
To gladden every hour the while.
The breeze so gently fans my brow,
So gently waves my flowing hair,
So low the forest branches bow,
As in obeisance, everywhere!
So beauteous are the blushing flowers,
Robed in their gayest summer bloom,
To cheer so many weary hours,
And breathe around such sweet perfume;
I wonder, mother, if they know
I love their cheerful smile to see,
And therefore strive they thus to show
How lovely ever they can be!
Others I hear complaining, day
By day, of gloomy hours they see;
But, mother, I'm so happy, say,
Are all those sights of joy for me?"

"No, not alone, my child, for these
Did God spread out the azure sky,
And cause the radiant sun to be
A sweet revealer to the eye
Of beauties mortals should not see
Without a grateful heart's employ
In praise and bending of the knee
To Him who gives such scenes of joy!
And not, my child, for thee alone,
The moon beams forth with silver light;
Nor that the twinkling stars are known
To glid the gloominess of night;
Nor yet that flowerets shed perfume,
And cool, refreshing breezes blow—
That pleasures round life's pathway bloom
Wherever thou may'st chance to go.
No, no, my child. For thee, for me,
For all these joyous scenes were made:
In all a Father's love we see;
For man all were by Him arrayed;
And, therefore, when we look on them,
To Him should grateful praise be given,
That, in our Saviour's diadem,
We may, as suns and stars of heaven,
At last shine on eternally!
Wouldst thou, my child, such honors share?
Then ever bend a suppliant knee,
And raise to Heaven a thankful prayer

LINGERIE.

CAPS FOR THE CHAMBER AND SICK-ROOM.

No. 1.

No. 2.

No. 3.

No. 4.

THE word "lingerie," which heads our article, will doubtless be unfamiliar to many of our readers, even though conversant with the French language. It is a term expressly used for the departments of fashion, and occurring constantly in the "Moniteur," "Les Modes Parisienne," and the other leading journals of the same nature. Nor can its introduction into the "Book" be censured, since "Maison de Lingerie" is a sign one meets with in the principal thoroughfares of our Atlantic cities, and our countrywomen are not supposed to be in ignorance of their object. We adopt the term, as many other French phrases have been incorporated into the vocabulary of fashion, because it best expresses what we wish to describe; for under this head comes every species of garment that we here denominate "plain sewing." Unfortunately, however, for the veracity of the last phrase, "white work" is now so much ornamented, that patterns at least must come from a shop expressly devoted to this branch of industry, whence comes the Maison de Lingerie of Paris, where everything of an under wardrobe that can be named is to be procured.

While upon the subject, it is as well to remark that we now and then receive remonstrances, not only against the introduction of French words, but of French fashions, to our readers. The very persons who pen them are probably wearing cravats or coats whose origin, if traced, would be found to date from over the water. It is in vain to deny the fact, that Paris leads the world in point of taste and fancy, and so it will be until the industrial arts are more cultivated and better paid among us. Since ladies—and gentlemen, too—will have new fashions, why not give them the most graceful that are produced?

For instance, we have seen such an outcry, and such a strife of tongues, over a new pattern of a night-cap, in a remote country village! It is discussed by all the pretty maidens who thriftily keep some too good for daily use for the sick-room, or, more frequently still, those whose bright eyes have already a trousseau in prospect. If ugly, it is nevertheless new, and to be copied. And think of the pretty faces disfigured by it for the next two years! How much better, then, to choose really pretty patterns, even if they have had the misfortune to be invented in Paris, and come from thence under the name of lingerie!

At any rate, we have had the temerity to choose such for our lady readers; and, placing them in order, Nos. 1 and 2 will be found, perhaps, the most difficult to copy.

The first is composed of linen cambric, or sheer jaconet muslin, insertion, and edging. The crown piece is cut very large, to receive the whole of the hair, plain at the top, but gathered into a band, with some fulness, at the sides. The front has a piece composed of alternate rows of insertion, from which three ruffles, headed with corresponding edging, extend; a similar one extends across the whole front. The strings are very broad, and encircled with corresponding edging. These broad strings, or tabs, it will be noticed, form the principal novelty in caps at the present time; they may be fastened across, under the chin, with a small gold cuff-pin; or narrower strings, of white Mantua or cotton gauze ribbon, will allow them to be only an ornament.

No. 2 has a crown of tucked muslin or cambric, the same effect, is open, produced by rows of narrow insertion. Three frills of wide embroidery form the front. These, as in Nos. 1 and 3, are to be fluted.

No. 3 has a shallower crown-piece, and a front composed of alternate puffs and insertion bands, with one frill of embroidered cambric. Intended for an invalid, it has a few knots of pale rose-colored ribbon at the side, with broad ends and strings of the same. This and the following will be found very neat and becoming shapes.

No. 4, as will easily be seen, is made entirely in a close shape, from the broiderie Anglaise, or thick cambric edging, so fashionable for undersleeves when first introduced. Cape and strings of the same; the last formed by simply uniting the embroidery in the centre, so that the scoops form a surrounding edge.

We would commend the illustrations of this article especially to the consideration of our readers, as cut by the young lady pupils of the "Philadelphia School of Design." As the work of our own sex, they have an especial interest, and challenge comparison with any other of the wood-cuts in the present number.

CARRYL'S WINDOW AND BED DRAPERIES.

(See Plate.)

SINCE our last notice of Mr. Carryl's beautiful establishment, a greater change in his stock of goods than even he could have anticipated has been wrought. A fire in the upper stories of the large new freestone building in which it is situated spared the exquisite fabrics, it is true, but the descending floods of water were as ruinous as the flames could have been.

When we next entered the rooms, a far different sight from the usual grace and elegance presented itself. The floor was strewn with torn and damp stained laces, gimps, or even heavier and more costly fabrics—piles of rich but tarnished cornices—boxes of half-ruined brocatelles—bales of soiled velvets, no longer regal in coloring. The draperies about the windows and on the walls hung in drooping, disordered folds, stained and torn away here and there as if in the hurry of some grand commotion. The very ceiling had grown shabby with the strips of wall paper peeling from the plaster, much of which strewed the floor and rustled beneath our feet.

But now, order and grace are again triumphant. Not a vestige of the conflagration or its effects remains. No cheap damaged goods; no "cornices a little bruised and stained, at a very low price." Mr. Carryl has had the good taste and energy to clear away all the wreck, and supply the place of a stock that had been accumulating from spring to fall, from fall to spring again, by entirely new orders, of the very latest design, finish, and execution. The new patterns are worth a minute examination, beauty of design and coloring being noticeable, as every year increases the demand, and consequently the outlay, upon these expensive fabrics.

Some of our readers will scarcely believe that large and superbly illustrated volumes are every year devoted exclusively to new designs for drapery. Not for the material, that is the work of the pattern designer, and never exhibited to the world except in the completion of what his drawing has suggested. But when they are manufactured, and ordered, and lying upon the shelves, there is still artistic taste needed in combining and arranging the different fabrics, and the folds and cross-folds and flutings into which they are to fall.

Now as all our fashions come from over the sea, and will, until taste and art are more cultivated at home, we have before us a large and beautiful volume furnished by Mr. Carryl, containing fifteen finely engraved and colored plates devoted to draperies alone. For windows, casements, mirrors, and their appropriate cornices, and ornaments; in some, the arrangement of an entire saloon is given, and a single bed fills another plate. The devices of some of the cornices are extremely graceful, the most noticeable one being a wreath of oak leaves and acorns, the centre being formed by the "bird of Jove," finely poised, with outstretched wings. One is almost bewildered among the many beautiful styles for window curtains, now one combining grace and lightness, and the next page has all the simple yet regal magnificence of heavy crimson draperies, and still weightier golden fringes, loops, and tassels. A rich purple velvet lambrequin throws out in fine contrast the delicate wreaths of lace embroidery beneath, or we come upon the fresh and many-tinted bouquets of a brocade in pale green centres, on which the flowers seem to live. The varieties of cornices and lambrequins are infinite. But of these we must confine ourselves and our description to those Mr. Carryl has chosen to be engraved for our readers.

Bed curtains are a nice question in our northern latitude, but they become indispensable as we go further south. The high posts, or frames, stand up gaunt and ungraceful when not draped, yet are needful supports for the also indispensable mosquito bars. Or there is the low bedstead, with the canopy answering the same purpose. But either requires drapery.

Of the window draperies, No. 1 has a heavy architectural cornice, with a lambrequin of purple velvet, from which depends a graceful fall of cords and tassels, breaking the otherwise harsh outline. The brocatelle drapery is of blue and wood colors, with a rich border of purple gimp and fringe.

In No. 2, the cornice is richly gilded of an unique and beautiful pattern. The lambrequin is also of a novel shape, and more than usually graceful. It is of the same material as the drapery, a rich crimson damask, of a shade like the finest ruby in the sunlight. This is bordered by an embroidery of gimp, pale green, and contrasting beautifully with the rich crimson of the curtain. Cords and a heavy fringe of the same complete the rich effect.

The under curtain is of lace, with a rich pattern of embroidery, and is draped from the cornice to the floor.

KNITTED ARTIFICIAL FLOWERS.

MICHAELMAS DAISY.

This flower may be knitted, with two stitches for the width of the row, but it is much quicker to work it in a chain of crotchet; it is generally variegated, either in two shades of red, or two shades of violet. The variegation is produced by working with two threads of Berlin wool, one of a deep, the other of a light shade, of the same color.

Make a chain of simple crotchet, about a yard in length, then cover a piece of thin wire, as long as you can conveniently manage, with one thread of Berlin wool, and begin to sew this wire along one edge of the chain, leaving about an inch of the wire at the beginning; when you have sewn about an inch, cut the chain, pull the thread through the last stitch, bring your wire round, sew half the second edge, then bring round the wire that you left at the beginning, sew it to meet the other, letting the wires cross each other, twist them and the wool together tightly, to form a stalk, and turn up the two little petals, first cutting away one of the wires close to the twist, to prevent the stalk being too thick when finished.

Wind a piece of yellow wool on the end of one of your fingers, pull it out thus doubled, and twist a bit of rather strong wire over it, twist the wire very tight, and make with this wool a kind of little ball, which must be covered with a piece of common net (dyed yellow, if possible), tie the net as tight as possible over the wool. This forms the daisy.

When you have made a sufficient number of petals to form two or three rows, each row being made rather larger than the first, you must sew them all round the little heart, and proceed to make the calyx as follows:—

Make a chain of twelve stitches with the crotchet needle, using green wool, not split, work two rows in double crotchet, increasing two stitches in the second row. Sew this calyx under the petals, fasten up the open side, and gather the stitches of the lower extremity, cover the stem with green split wool.

BUD.

Make a small ball of any color, then take fifteen or twenty bits of split wool, the same colors as used for the flower, each about an inch long, tie them tightly as a little bundle; fasten this on the top of the little ball, to which you must first fix a wire; bring down the ends of wool in alternate stripes of dark and light shades, tie all these ends round the wire, and cut them close. Wind a bit of green wool, as a very small ball, immediately under the bud, then with green wool, not split, make a row of herring-bone stitches, from the little bud, to about half way up the colored one. This makes a very pretty bud, looking as if just ready to bloom.

LEAF.

Like that of the Heart's-ease.*

* Directions for knitting the Heart's-ease will be given in a future number of the "Lady's Book."

PATTERNS FOR SILK EMBROIDERY.

This pattern may be wrought in silk on merino or flannel, or in cotton on muslin. It makes a rich border.

KNITTED BERRIES AND FRUIT.

STRAWBERRY AND ITS LEAF.

Four needles (No. 20) are required. The strawberry may be knitted in two different ways;* in plain rounds, or in the following manner, more exactly conformable to nature:—

Cast on an even number of stitches, from thirty to

* It may also be shaded, or all scarlet, according to the variety which you have selected for model.

forty, in scarlet Berlin wool, not split; or, better, in purse twist, rather coarse, of a bright shade.

First round.—Knit one, purl one, throughout the round.

Second round.—Purl one, knit one, throughout the round.

Continue in this manner, beginning alternately with the plain and with the purled stitch, till you have worked about half the length of the strawberry. Then decrease one stitch on each needle every other round. When three stitches only remain on each needle, gather these, and fasten off. Fill the strawberry with emery, and fasten off tight the second aperture, after having inserted it in a stem made of double wire, covered with green wool or silk.

The next piece is the calyx: two needles only are used:—

Cast on six stitches with a bright shade of green wool or silk.

First row.—Make one, knit one, throughout the row.

Second row.—Purled.

Third row.—Make one, knit two, throughout the row.

Fourth row.—Purled.

Sixth row.—Purled.

Next row.—Make one, knit two, turn back, purl the same stitches. Repeat the two last rows three times, then decrease one stitch, knit one, purl together the two last, break the wool or silk a yard at least from the work; thread with it a rug needle; pass the needle through the loop of the last stitch, and bring it to the next stitches on the needle, by sewing neatly with it the left edge of the little leaf just made. Work the next two stitches in the same manner, and repeat the same operation till all the stitches are worked in small leaves, united at their base. Edge them with wire covered with green wool or silk; place your strawberry in the middle; fasten together strawberry and calyx, and, if you like, add a leaf made as follows:—

LEAF.

Cast on one stitch.

First row.—Make one, knit one.

Second row.—Make one, purl two.

Third row.—Make one, knit three.

Fourth row.—Make one, purl four.

Fifth row.—Knit two, make one, knit one, make one, knit the remainder of the row, and continue in alternate purled and knitted rows, making one stitch before and one after the middle stitch in every plain row till you have seventeen or nineteen stitches; then purl one row, knit one row, without increase; purl the next row, and at the beginning of the following row knit together the first two stitches; break the wool about a yard from the work; pass the nec-dle through the loop of the last stitch, bring it to the next stitches on the needle, by sewing neatly with it a stitch or two on the left edge of the little scallop just made; knit plain the remainder of the row. Purl together the first two stitches of the next row; pass the rug needle through the loop just made; bring the wool along the edge of the little scallop to the next stitches on the needle; purl the remainder of the row, and continue the same process till all the stitches, except the three middle ones, are worked in small scallops. Then slip one stitch, knit one, turn the slipped stitch over the knitted one; purl together the two remaining stitches; fasten off; cover a wire with green wool, sew it neatly round the leaf, making the little scallops as sharply pointed as possible. As the strawberry leaf is composed of three, make this the middle one, and work two more in the same manner, but a little smaller, say with two stitches less, and place them on each side of the first.

N. B. The little seeds on the strawberry are embroidered with golden-colored floss silk when the strawberry is finished.

PATCHWORK CUSHION.

Materials.—Black velvet ribbon, one inch wide; rich purple merino or silk, of two shades, which must approximate; gold-colored ditto, and a skein of narrow Russian silk braiding to match exactly with the gold and the lighter purple; 12 yards of gold-colored chain gimp, and 4 tassels to match.

The diagrams being given of the full size, for every part, no difficulty can occur in cutting out the different sections. The octagons are formed alternately of stars, made in the purple material, and formed into the proper shape by means of gold-colored diamonds, which fit in between the points, and octagons of gold-color, braided with purple, and edged with black velvet ribbon braided in gold. Purple diamonds, braided with gold, or vice versa, fill up the spaces between the octagons; and sections of the same (halves and quarters) are used to form the whole into a square.

In choosing the purple merino, take care that it is of a bright tint, and that there is no great difference between the two shades, as they are intended merely to give the effect of light and shadow. The star consists of sixteen pieces, namely, eight of each shade, and the same number of gold-colored diamonds. The yellow octagon may be either in one piece or in eight, the braiding being in four parts; meeting in the centre, as represented in the engraving.

In running on silk braid, it is often so difficult to obtain sewing silk to match, that it is very convenient to cut off a length of braid, and draw out the threads for sewing it on: this saves a great deal of trouble.

Braid patterns are marked, like those for embroidery, by being first pricked on stout paper, laid over the material, and pounced.

The cushion is accurately represented in the engraving. It consists of the following pieces:—

Five yellow and black octagons.

Four purple ditto.

Four diamonds.

Four diamond quarters, for corners.

Eight half-diamonds, for the sides.

The other side of the cushion may be of purple or gold merino, or black velvet. A trimming of chain gimp, and four handsome tassels, complete it.

EDITORS' TABLE.

A GRAND missionary jubilee was celebrated in London on the 16th of June, as the completion of the third cycle of fifty years since the first Protestant missions to the heathen were begun. One hundred and fifty years! thus long have British Christians been engaged in disseminating the Gospel. It is only forty years since the first missionaries from our American churches were sent forth. Marked success has attended these efforts, particularly in the schools established for heathen children; these are chiefly instructed by the wives of missionaries, or other female teachers sent out for this purpose.

Throughout the heathen world the apparatus of Christianity, so to speak, is prepared. The Bible has been translated into the languages of the greater portion of the nations and tribes of Asia and Africa. Tracts and other books are translated; printing-presses are established; what is needed is to reach the fountain of life in those lands, and bring the healing stream of God's Word to purify the stagnant pools and sweeten the bitter waters of sin and ignorance that now diffuse only death to the souls of the people. This fountain of life is the mothers of the land: through female aid in teaching these and their children, daughters particularly, the truth only can be rendered effective. Good men, American Protestant Christians even, have hardly yet conceived what influence pious educated women might wield in this work. Yet, when we turn to the earliest annals of the true Church, we find this agency not only used, but openly acknowledged and commended. In St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans—his first on record—sent by Phebe, who certainly held an office in the church at Cenchrea, he names eight other female "laborers" as among his best helpers—Priscilla, Mary, Tryphena, Tryphosa, Persis, Julia, the mother of Rufus, and the sister of Nereus. "Phebe was a succorer of many:" so might missionary female physicians now become, and, through their agency, reach those whose conversion would, with Heaven's blessing, insure the speedy success of Christian missions.

In the "Medical Department" at Siam, as we learn from a late Report of the Presbyterian mission, much good had been effected. "Six days in the week, Dr. House spends two hours a day at the floating hospital, used as a dispensary, except when absent on missionary tours in the interior, and during the prevalence of the cholera. New cases only were recorded, amounting to 1371, making, in two and a half years since his arrival, 4488 patients." Very few of these were females; such cannot be reached by male practitioners, and must therefore suffer the agonies of bodily disease one of their own sex, if properly qualified, might relieve. In addition to all other miseries and deprivations imposed on women in the East. In Calcutta, so long ruled by the British, where their physicians are employed freely by rich Hindoo men, it is only in cases of extremity among the women that one is called to their aid, and then only permitted to see the patient, so covered and concealed, that only the tongue and wrist are exposed to view. As a measure of humanity only, the sending out qualified female physicians to those countries would be a great charity; but the aid such pious, intelligent ladies might give to the mission cause is incalculable. Very few men in this profession are willing to go out—very few have the faith and zeal needed for the work; but the daughters of America are, like Phebe, ready to be sent, ready to become "succorers of many," were they only suitably educated, encouraged, and sustained.

COLPORTEURS IN AMERICA.—There is an important field of missionary labor in our own land, where women might be employed to great advantage, namely, as colporteurs, or distributors of tracts and books. The Boards of Publication now employ men only, whose services must be paid at a much higher rate than women would require. Except in the thinly settled portions of our country, where much travelling to reach the insulated settlers is necessary, the work of distributing publications might be done, and well done, by pious women, to whom a small stipend would be of much importance. There are widows who need this employment for support, and single women who need employment for health, and many women would like this way of doing good. Let a suitable number of such women be appointed in this city—say, by the Presbyterian Board of Publication (we name this because we have heard it was greatly in need of colporteurs or distributors, and could not obtain them)—to visit throughout Philadelphia, and dispose of their publications as the Board directs; and extend the same arrangement to every city, town, and village throughout our land. In every place women would be found suitable and willing to undertake this profession. It is one exactly suited to them. It enters into their domestic circle of feelings and pursuits; and "honorable women, not a few," would be found ready to engage in the work. A number of men would be needed to penetrate the wild places of our land; but, throughout all the settled portions, women would be the most effective agents. By this arrangement a double gain would be secured. The talents of pious women, now allowed to be wasted on trifles, would be employed in the cause of moral improvement, and those men who now give up their time, often at a great pecuniary sacrifice, to the colporteur's duty, would be at liberty to enter on other pursuits more beneficial to themselves and to society.

We do not propose any innovation on domestic life by this arrangement. The duties of HOME will ever be the great profession of woman; the most sacred, the most happy, the most honorable she can perform. But there is a large proportion of time now unemployed by the sex, or worse, devoted to novel-reading or frivolous pursuits. Such waste of time is severely censured by Christian moralists—men who teach what should not be done. But till these men provide suitable employments for the talents and time of their daughters as well as for their sons, the former will, of necessity, fall into indolence or frivolity. A greater diversity of honorable employments for women are needed. This, of distributing useful publications, augmenting good and preventing evil, would be in unison with their nature. Try the experiment, Christian men, you who have the power to order and arrange. We believe that success, almost beyond calculation, would crown the enterprise.

COMMON SCHOOLS IN OHIO.—"The system of public schools is rapidly spreading all over the country. The prosperous and flourishing State of Ohio now boasts of 12,664 schools. Nearly $300,000 was paid by Ohio for common schools in the year 1851."

Such is the record; but there must be some mistake in the figures. If the amount paid by the State be only $300,000, divided among 12,664 schools, it would give but a fraction over fifteen dollars to each school. If the sum is, as we believe, nearly $2,000,000, it would only make an average of about one hundred and fifty-eight dollars to each school. Is there any young man in our land, worthy of being employed as a teacher, who would serve as a school-master for $158 per year? We may see from this how indispensable it is to the success of the common-school system, that the young women of our country should be qualified and chiefly employed as instructors of children and youth.

THE MARRIAGE RELATION.—Addison has left on record the following important sentence: "Two persons who have chosen each other out of all the species, with the design to be each other's mutual comfort and entertainment, have in that action bound themselves to be good-humored, affable, forgiving, patient, and joyful, with respect to each other's frailties and imperfections, to the end of their lives."

THE ROMAN WOMEN.—A writer in a late review, speaking of the Roman women, and their influence during the existence of the kingdom, says: "From the time of the Sabines to Theodora's conquest of Justinian, women seem to have been at the bottom of almost all the memorable events of Roman history. Lucretia, Virginia, Veturia, Fabia, the wife of Licinius, who became, at her instigation, the first Plebeian Consul, are illustrious examples of this; and, whatever may be the changes of manners and opinions, as Hume has well remarked, all nations, with one accord, point for the ideal of a virtuous matron, to the daughter of Scipio, and the mother of the Gracchi." Who, then, will doubt the influence of women?

THE MOTHER.—It has been truly said: "The first being that rushes to the recollection of a soldier or a sailor, in his heart's difficulty, is his mother. She clings to his memory and affection in the midst of all the forgetfulness and hardship induced by a roving life. The last message he leaves is for her, his last whisper breathes her name. The mother, as she instills the lesson of piety and filial obligation into the heart of her infant son, should always feel that her labor is not in vain. She may drop into the grave; but she has left behind her influence that will work for her. The bow is broken, but the arrow is sped, and will do its office."

WOMAN'S INTELLECT.—Mr. Hume, in his "History of England," speaking of the unfortunate Lady Jane Grey, has this memorable passage: "She had received all her education with King Edward VI., and seemed to possess even a greater facility in acquiring every part of manly and classical literature." In the conduct of her education, the prejudices against the intellectual character of the sex seem to have been forgotten; and history, as it records the moral worth of this unfortunate lady, at the same time bears high testimony of her intellectual attainments.

In speaking also of Queen Elizabeth, a sovereign whose principal fault was her personal vanity—and great men are not always devoid of this weakness of vanity—the same historian uses the following language: "Her vigor, her constancy, her vigilance, penetration, and address, merit the highest praises. The wise ministers and able men that flourished during her reign, owed all of them their advancement to her choice, and, with all their endeavors, were never able to obtain an undue ascendancy over her." This last assertion casts some doubt on the truth of the commonly received opinion concerning the vanity of Elizabeth. All the flattery those men could offer her, never succeeded in misleading her judgment, or controlling her sense of the duties of her station.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "Nebuchadnezzar's Dream," "Presentiment," "Lines," "To the Evening Star," "The Faded Flower," "The Departed," "To the Faithless," "Away with Care," "The Twins," "Evening Thoughts," "The Newly Married," "Alice Gray," "Love's Elysium," "The Miser," and "Memory's Dreams."

Note.—Will the editor who sent us the poem commencing—have the goodness to send us his address? We have lost his letter, and cannot return the poem till we hear from him.

"Where are the light and happy hearts?"

"The Chase" and "Lines" are neither of them quite perfect. The pieces will do better for a newspaper than for the "Lady's Book." They will be returned.

The following are declined; several of these articles are worth publishing, if we had room: "The Rainbow," "Lines to a Friend," "Patience," "Bad Bargains," "The Return," "Twilight Musings," "The Widow's Prayer," "To H—," "A Secret hidden in my heart," "Hope," "Songs of Triumph," and "The Forsaken One."

Will F. E. F., of New York, please let us hear from her!

OUR TREASURY.

HOW TO MANAGE THE WORLD.

BY MRS. GORE.

WATERTON, the naturalist, who, like Mungo Park, and other bold adventurers into lands beyond the sea, passes for the fabricator of half the marvels he was the first to witness, asserts that, whenever he encountered an alligator à la tête in the wilderness, he used to leap on his back, and ride the beast to death. This feat, so much discredited by the stay-at-home critics, was an act of neither bravery nor braggartry, but of necessity. Either the man or the alligator must have had the upper hand. Il a fallu opter.

Just so are we situated with regard to the world. Either we must leap upon its back, strike our spur into its panting sides, and, in spite of its scaly defences, compel it to obey our glowing will, or the animal will mangle us with its ferocious jaws, and pursue its way towards its refuge in the cool waters, leaving us expiring in the dust. Either the world or the individual must obtain the upper hand. Happy he who hath the genius and presence of mind of a Waterton!

The greatest difficulty experienced nowadays in accomplishing the subjugation of the brute, is to get it on foot, with the view of mounting. Lazy and over-fed, it lies ruminating, half lost amid the springing grass of its fertile meadows, like a Cheshire cow, which, when roused by an occasional impulse of friskiness, goes combrously frolicking round the pastures, without aim or end, save that of its own cork-screwed tail, only to subside anew into the apathetic torpor of obesity. What is to be done with such a world? A prick less penetrating than that of a goad will not awaken it from its luxurious and self-sufficing ruminations; nay, a stunning blow between the horns is absolutely indispensable to overmaster its huge, heavy, and powerful organization.

Between the somnolence and selfishness of the applauding classes, celebrity has become a thing of yesterday! There is neither courage nor energy left in the world to engender a great reputation. As of old the gods deserted Greece, great men are deserting Great Britain.

WHAT TO TEACH.

BY MRS. EMMA WILLARD.

WHAT is the best of all possible things to be taught? MORAL GOODNESS. That respects God and man; God first, and man second. To infuse into the mind of a child, therefore, love and fear towards God—the perfect—in wisdom, goodness, justice, and power—the Creator, Benefactor, and Saviour, the secret Witness and the Judge—this is of all teaching the very best. But it cannot be accomplished merely in set times and by set phrases; it should mingle in all the teacher's desires and actions. The child imbibes it when he sees that the instructor feels and acts on it himself. When the youth is untruthful, when he wounds his companion in body, in mind, in character, or in property, then show him that his offence is against God; that you are God's ministers to enforce his laws, and must do your duty. Be thus mindful in all sincerity, judge correctly, adopt no subterfuge, pretend not to think the child is better than he is, but deal plainly and truly, though lovingly, with him; then his moral approbation will go with you, though it should be against himself, and even if circumstances require you to punish him. The voice of conscience residing in his heart is as the voice of God; and, if you invariably interpret that voice with correctness and truth, the child will submit and obey you naturally and affectionately. But, if your government is unjust or capricious, if you punish one day what you pass over or approve another, the dissatisfied child will naturally rebel.

Next to moral goodness is HEALTH AND STRENGTH, soundness of body and of mind. This, like the former, is not what can be taught at set times, and in set phrases; but it must never be lost sight of. It must regulate the measure and the kind of exercise required of the child, both bodily and mental, as well as his diet, air, and accommodations. The regular routine of school duties consists in teaching acts for the practice of future life; or sciences in which the useful or ornamental arts find their first principles; and great skill is required of the teacher in assigning to each pupil an order of studies suitable to his age, and then selecting such books and modes of teaching as shall make a little time go far.

ON THE SCHOOL COMPOSITIONS OF CHILDREN.

BY MISS PEABODY.

INSTRUCTORS are not, perhaps, aware how much the art of composition is kept from being developed in children by petty criticism. Children have a great deal to contend with in the attempt to express their thoughts. In the first place, they find it more difficult than better-trained minds do to preserve their thoughts in their memory. For the mechanical labor of holding the pen, of seeing to the spelling, of pointing, and all such details, interferes with the purely mental effort. And even when all this is mastered, and they express original thought, it is like putting out a part of themselves, and they are intensely alive to its reception in proportion to its real originality; and, if it is misunderstood, or its garb criticised, they shrink more than they would at a rude physical touch, and will be very much tempted to suppress their own thoughts on another occasion, and only attempt the commonplaces, for which they have heard expressions.

For there seems to be, in all finely attuned spirits, a natural modesty, sometimes even a shrinking delicacy, which instinctively forbids exposure of the invisible exercises of the mind and heart, except to the eye of a generous liberality and a tender love: and it is only time for reflection and a fully realised faith, which gives the strength of mind that may separate the sense of personality from the expression of general truth and beauty, and make clear and possible to them the duty of reposing on the intrinsic worth of what is said, and at all events frankly to express themselves.

And is there not a beautiful cause for the modesty of childhood and genius? Is not the ideal, in these instances, more vivid, to which their own actual creation is so painful a contrast, that, if they are forced to attend to the discrepancy, they are discouraged? It has been remarked that the first essays of high genius are seldom in perfect taste, but exhibit "the disproportions of the ungrown giant." This can be easily explained. Genius is apt to feel most deeply the infinite, and, never losing sight of even those connections which it does not express, is unaware of the imperfections of what is seen by others, which is only a part of what is created in its own being. But, if left to a natural development, and unhindered by internal moral evil, the mind always works itself out to perfect forms: while premature criticism mildews the flower, and blasts the promised fruit.

This case of genius is not irrelevant. Intellectual education, as an art, is an embodiment of all those laws and means which the development of genius manifests to be the best atmosphere for the production of creative power. For all minds are to be cherished by the same means by which genius is developed. In the first place, we never know but we have genius to deal with among our pupils, and should therefore always make our plan with reference to it; knowing that the smallest degree of mind is also benefited in its due proportion by the discipline which brings out the highest, and is certainly quenched by those processes from which genius suffers. It would not perhaps be going too far to say, that the period of school education is too early a period for criticism on any original production. There is only one fault which may be excepted from this rule, and that is affectation, a style which proceeds from want of the sentiment of truth. Even this, however, should not be taken up as literary blunder, but as moral evil, of which it is an expression, quite as much as affectation of manners and want of veracity.

LOVE.

BY P. J. BAILEY.

Ask not of me, love, what is love?
Ask what is good of God above;
Ask of the great sun what is light;
Ask what is darkness of the night;
Ask sin of what may be forgiven;
Ask what is happiness of Heaven;
Ask what is folly of the crowd;
Ask what is fashion of the shroud;
Ask what is sweetness of thy kiss;
Ask of thyself what beauty is—
And, if they each should answer "I"
Let me, too, join them with a sigh.
Oh, let me pray my life may prove,
When thus with thee, that I am love!

Literary Notices.

From LIPPINCOTT, GRAMBO & Co., Philadelphia:—

LECTURES ON ANCIENT HISTORY, from the Earliest Times to the taking of Alexandria by Octavius. Comprising the History of the Asiatic Nations, the Egyptians, Greeks, Macedonians, and Carthaginians. By B. G. Niebuhr. Translated from the German edition of Dr. Marcus Niebuhr, by Dr. Leonhard Schmits, F. R. S. E., Rector of the High School of Edinburgh. With additions and corrections from his own MS. notes. In three volumes. These lectures, which established a golden reputation for the author during his life, embrace some of the most important acquisitions that have been made to ancient history in our own times; proving, indeed, that much of the past still remains to be developed and authenticated through the zeal and industry of modern investigation. The title of the work, as we have transcribed it, will be sufficiently explicit to attract the attention, and to commend these volumes to the consideration of students of history, and to all such readers as love to search out and contemplate the motives and actions of men in the remote ages of the world.

OUTLINES OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. By Thomas B. Shaw, B. A., Professor of English Literature in the Imperial Alexander Lyceum of St. Petersburg. A new American edition. With sketches of American literature by Henry T. Tuckerman, author of "Characteristics of Literature," etc. This is a work which will naturally commend itself to the perusal of every person who desires to be well-informed in relation to the progress of English literature in Britain and in the United States.

THE CLASSICAL MANUAL: an Epitome of Ancient Geography, Greek and Roman Mythology, Antiquities, and Chronology. Chiefly intended for the use of schools. Compiled by James S. Baird, Trinity College, Dublin, Assistant Classical Master, King's School, Gloucester. The object of the author has been to elucidate the Greek and Roman authors usually read in the junior forms of our schools.

From C. G. HENDERSON & Co., Philadelphia:—

A NEW AND IMPROVED STANDARD FRENCH AND ENGLISH AND ENGLISH AND FRENCH DICTIONARY. By A. G. Colloz. pp. 1324. We think this the most complete and thoroughly useful work of the kind ever published in our country. Such a one was needed. The long and successful experience of the author in teaching languages gives assurance that he has well studied the difficult subject he undertook; his great learning and persevering talents are estimated by the able manner in which he has performed it. Those who study French without a master, as many do, will find this dictionary an indispensable assistant; and, as a family reference, its good print and large type will insure it favor. The publishers have done their part liberally, and deserve, as does the author, the liberal patronage of the public.

ÆSOP IN RHYME; or, Old Friends in a New Dress. By Yarnmaduke Park. This very beautiful edition of the fables of the Phrygian dwarf is another proof of the power of genius. The wealth of Croesus has not left a trace of its possessor on earth; but the writings of his servant, Æsop, are now equal to gold in the hands of their publishers, and better than gold in those of their readers. The volume before us is a choice specimen of art for children, because the engravings are really good. A prettier gift book for the young will rarely be found.

From LIPPINCOTT, GRAMBO & Co. (successors to Grigg & Elliot), No. 14 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia:—

WAVELEY NOVELS. Abbotsford Edition. Volume 2. "The Black Dwarf"

From CHARLES SCRIBNER, New York, through LIPPINCOTT, GRAMBO & Co., Philadelphia:—

EXAMPLES OF LIFE AND DEATH, by Mrs. L. H. Sigourney, will be received by wise and tasteful readers as among the literary gems of our country. This book is not only historically instructive, but richly attractive, recommended by great beauty of style and purity of sentiment, and by the truth of its representations. The brief sketch of William Penn contained in these "Examples of Life and Death," affords us an exquisite summary of his remarkable character, sufficient of itself to give value to this volume in the estimation of our fellow-citizens. In the most condensed form, Mrs. Sigourney presents us with an undeniable refutation of Macaulay's calumnies of a man, the facts of whose whole life prove the sacrifice he made in attestation of the holiness of his practice and principles. We would particularly commend the beautiful outline of Monica's life to every mother.

From GEORGE P. PUTNAM, No. 10 Park Place, New York, through LIPPINCOTT, GRAMBO & Co., Philadelphia:—

ROUGHING IT IN THE BUSH; or, Life in Canada. By Mrs. Moodie. Parts first and second. Price 25 cents each. These amusing volumes are uniform with "Putnam's Semi-Monthly Library for Travellers and the Fireside." It is but just to add, however, that the reader will find something more than amusement in these volumes. Mrs. Moodie is known as a lady of more than ordinary genius and attainments, as a writer of poetry as well as prose.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through LINDSAY & BLAKISTON, Philadelphia:—

THE HISTORY OF THE RESTORATION OF MONARCHY IN FRANCE. By Alphonse De Lamartine, author of the "History of the Girondists." Volume 2. We have nothing to add to the general notice made of this work on the appearance of the first volume.

MARCO PAUL'S VOYAGES AND TRAVELS. By Jacob Abbott. Marco's travels in New York, on the Erie Canal, in Maine, in Vermont, in Boston, and his visit to Springfield Armory, are embraced in four neat little volumes, handsomely illustrated. They contain a great deal of information, in an agreeable form, for young readers.

From GOULD & LINCOLN, Boston, through W. B. ZIEBEN, Philadelphia:—

CHAMBERS'S POCKET MISCELLANY. Vol. 3. We are always sure that a work from the Messrs. Chambers will be instructive as well as interesting. This series now in course of publication keeps up the credit of the house, and does credit to the taste of those who prepare it for the American public.

From J. S. REDFIELD, Clinton Hall, New York, through W. B. ZIEBEN, Philadelphia:—

THE KNIGHTS OF ENGLAND, FRANCE, AND SCOTLAND. By Henry William Herbert, author of "The Cavaliers of England." This volume contains twenty-four distinct stories, written in Mr. Herbert's animated and fascinating style, and descriptive of men and manners in a most interesting period of the world.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF FITZGREEN HALLECK. A new and beautiful edition.

From BUNCE & BROTHERS, New York, through T. B. PETERSON, Philadelphia:—

WHITEFRIARS; or, the Days of Charles the Second. An historical romance. With original illustrations by Chapin. Complete in one volume. Price 50 cents. We have had no time to look into this book of 237 pages, but observe that it has been pronounced the best historical romance since "Waverley."

From LONG & BROTHERS, New York:—

THE FORTUNES AND MISFORTUNES OF HARRY RACKET SCAPEGRACE. This is a romance which will greatly interest the reader, from the fact that its pictures of real life are drawn with a master pen; and, although those pictures are not always pictures of virtue, they have blended with them such excellent moral contrasts as will render them salutary lessons to ingenuous minds. The name of "Harry Racket Scapegrace," we admit, is rather indicative of a work of low origin; but the most sensitive have nothing to apprehend on that score, for the language is chaste, and the sentiments inculcated by the author such as might be placed without danger before every class of readers, while the wild and exciting adventures of the hero are candidly and justly traced to their true sources. The work is published as a companion to "Frank Fairleigh." It has several illustrations. Price 50 cents.

BEN BRACE. By Captain Chamier, author of the "Life of a Sailor," etc. Illustrated. This work has been very fairly ranked with the best nautical works of Cooper and Marryatt, by those who are capable of judging of the truthfulness of life and its incidents on the ocean. Price 50 cents.

THE ONWARD AGE: an Anniversary Poem, recited before the "Young Men's Mercantile Library Association of Cincinnati," in honor of its Eighteenth Anniversary. By T. Buchanan Read. This is a very beautiful and a very sensible poem on the subject of progress, by a gentleman who has, by his perseverance and industry, made great progress, not only as an artist, but as a poet. There are but few, indeed, of the readers of the Philadelphia periodicals who are not familiar with the name and works of the amiable poet and excellent artist, T. Buchanan Read.

From JAMES MUNROE & Co., Boston and Cambridge:—

A SELECTION OF ENGLISH SYNONYMS. First American edition, from the second London edition. Revised and enlarged. This work has received high praise from the British critics. The greatest fault found against it is its brevity. Is not this rather a merit? A great book can never become, as this may, the pocket companion of the scholar. And, what is of more importance in our country, men of business can spare time to study this treatise, and thus improve their precision in the use of language; and women will be inclined to perfect their knowledge of words, which it is their department to teach, in the first instance, to each "rising generation." We think the book will be found very useful.

THE OLD ENGAGEMENT. A Spinster's Story. By Julia Day. There are so many novels nowadays, that it is not very easy to find discriminating phrases to set forth their different style and air. But this is a simple story of domestic life, and those who are pleased with an easy, unpretending book will enjoy it.

THE UNIVERSITY SPEAKER: a Collection of Pieces designed for College Exercises in Declamation and Recitation. With Suggestions on the Appropriate Elocution of Particular Passages. By William Russell. Another of a series of Reading Books, &c. &c. There is little need of urging the claims of any work by this author on public attention.

His high standing as a teacher of elocution gives him authority as a writer on the art. But the great variety of choice extracts here presented makes the book of interest for the family circle as well as for the college.

From LITTLE, BROWN & Co., Boston:—

REVIEW OF LORD MAHON'S HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. From the "North American Review" for July, 1852.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York:—

LITTLE PEDDLINGTON AND THE PEDDLINGTONIANS. By John Poole. As indicated by the name and authorship, these two volumes of the "Popular Library" are satirical sketches of life and society; but rarely do we find satire so well sustained, or so little poisoned with personal bitterness. Shooting "folly as it flies" seems the author's purpose, and the arrow is keen and glittering, and always reaches the mark. It is so full of good things, that we could quote the whole, page by page; but we must satisfy ourselves and our readers, if possible, after the fashion of little Jack Horner, extracting a plum here and there.

The chronicler of "Little Peddlington" had travelled; had exhausted nearly every place of summer resort, when the beauties of this delightful village were brought under his notice by the "Guide-Book of Felix Hoppy, Esq." and he as suddenly resolves to visit so Utopian a paradise, where illness, discontent, envy, and, indeed, every ill that flesh is heir to, would seem to be forever banished. But, alas! "Little Peddlington" proves to be an epitome of the great world! Social, literary, scientific, and artistic humbugging are rife. Take, for instance, the newly-discovered medicinal spring in the Vale of Henth, ye patrons of "acid water" and "cod-liver oil":—

"Taken to the extreme corner of the vale. A man busy planting trees and shrubs about a deep hole. Wondered what that was for. Informed by Hobbleday that Doctors Drench and Dralnum—their celebrated physicians, and the proprietors of that portion of the ground—had had the good fortune to discover there a mineral spring, of the nastiest water you ever put to your lips. 'I've tasted it,' continued Hobbleday; 'enough to poison a dog! So it will be the making of the place, as they say. But what is to become of Cheltenham, Harrowgate, Tunbridge Wells, and such places? However, poor devils, that's their affair!' Fancied I smelt something like the detestable odor of a tanyard. Peeped through the window of a small shed, the door of which was fastened by a strong padlock. Saw a box of sulphur, a couple of bags of iron filings, a pile of stale red-herrings, some raw-hide cut into strips, and a quantity of bark, such as the tanners use. Wondered what that was for."

The press has also its clever hits. The astonishing amiability of the family where,

"In order that things may be toujours tranquille, They seldom express themselves just as they feel,"

is only to be equalled by the peaceful spirit of the "Little Peddlington Weekly Observer," so pithily set forth in the motto—

"All parties to please, and all difference to smother
What in one line we state, we retract in another;"

but that surely can have no reference to the advertised neutral prints of the day. And here are the advantages of taking a newspaper, set forth in a most unanswerable style:—

"And pray, Mr. Yawkins," said I, "which, in your opinion, is the greater actor of the two?"

"Why really, sir," said he, "that is a question which it is utterly impossible to answer. When I had but one paper to read—the "Observer"—I was convinced that Waddle was the better; but, since the "Dictator" has been established, and the preference given to Souxel, I am greatly perplexed."

"But have you no opinion of your own?" inquired I, with some degree of astonishment.

"An opinion of my own? Bless me, sir, what an extraordinary question! What is the use of reading a newspaper, if one is to be at the trouble of thinking for one's self after all?"

We commend the unquestioning faith of Mr. Yawkins to the reading public generally.

Here is a shot at the misnomers now becoming so frequent with us, as well as in England:—

"Why, then, does the gallant colonel call his place an abbey?" I inquired.

"First," gravely replied Hobbleday, "because it's the fashion; and, secondly, because it's a small, square, red-brick house, standing in a cabbage garden."

"The second, being as good a reason as is frequently to be found for nick-naming residences, of similar pretensions, manors, abbays, places, and castles, I was satisfied with it."

The drama has a large share of our author's notice; the fine arts, and the rivalry between the votaries of each, are capitally portrayed. We should like room for the portrait of the immortal Daubson, who requests a candid criticism of his pictures, whereupon the following feeling reflection is introduced:—

"Can a more agreeable task be assigned to you than that of delivering to an artist, an author, or, indeed, to anybody, a candid opinion of his productions, especially if, in the excess of your candor, you temper a hundred weight of praise with but one little grain of censure? Let mine enemy walk through the rooms of the Royal Academy even, in arm with an exhibitor, and try it, that's all."

But we have room only for an outline portrait of the present style of progress-women, which, we are quite sure, can give no offence to any who are our friends. The cant has made rapid strides since the portrait was penned, yet the chief characteristics are identical:—

"Masculine-minded creature!" exclaimed Hoppy, with a gesture of admiration.

"I think for herself on all points, moral, political, and social!" exclaimed Rummins.

"Not a prejudice remaining!" responded the M. C.; "and has no more religion than a horse!"

A STEP FROM THE NEW WORLD TO THE OLD, AND BACK AGAIN. With Thoughts of the Good and Evil in Both. By Henry P. Tappan. Since it has become but "a step from the New World to the Old," it is one which everybody feels bound to take, and to give the public the benefit of their observations. We welcome our friend, set down in Chestnut Street, eleven days from Liverpool. "Were you at Rome?" "Oh yes, certainly, four days!" Time was when four months was little time enough to devote to the Eternal City. Mr. Tappan has managed to "do" Europe almost as speedily, and does not hesitate to give us his individual opinion on all subjects; now moralising, and now predicting. But, having some freshness of thought and feeling, it is, in a measure, imparted to the familiar scenes which he describes, in the two elegantly printed volumes.

THE DAYS OF BRUCE. A Story from Scottish History. By Grace Aguilar. The death of this gifted girl has given to the public several posthumous publications, edited by her mother. We consider the "Days of Bruce" among the best. It is true to history; the stirring scenes of the Scottish war being sketched with vigor, particularly the crowning of Bruce at Scone, the taking of Kildrummie Castle, and the ever-celebrated battle of Bannockburn. Through this runs a vein of romance, developing several beautiful imaginary characters, exceedingly well drawn. It will take the place of the "Scottish Chiefs" with the present generation.

TIME AND TIDE; or, Strive and Win. By A. S. Roe, author of "James Menjoy," etc. etc. We have a special word of commendation for this little volume, the more so that, remembering its sketchy, unartistic predecessors, we expected little from it. We congratulate the author on a rapid advance, both in management of plot and detail. The story is of American life, a natural, beautiful picture of the faith and feeling still remaining among men in the quiet of country life, while the tale of a city's trials and temptations for the young is warningly set forth. Many of the characters are well drawn, and the general moral is unexceptionable.

All the above publications of Messrs. Appleton reach us through Henderson of this city.

Receipts, &c.

TO MAKE A FINE CUSTARD PUDDING, mix by degrees a pint of good milk with a large spoonful of flour, the yolks of five eggs, some orange-flower water, and a little pounded cinnamon. Butter a basin that will exactly hold it, pour the batter in, and tie a floured cloth over it; put in boiling water over the fire, and turn it about five minutes to prevent the egg going to one side. Half an hour will boil it.

TO PROMOTE THE GROWTH OF THE HAIR when it becomes thin, try the following: Eau de cologne, two ounces; tincture of cantharides, two drachms; oil of rosemary and oil of lavender, of each ten drops.

TO CLEAN MOTHEE-O'-PEARL, wash in whiting and water. Soap destroys the brilliancy.

PREVIOUS to the reign of Charles VIII., the queens of France wore white upon the death of their husbands, and were thus called "Reines blanches." On the death of that monarch, the mourning was changed to black.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

Will our fair subscribers please notice that we have no collecting agents, and depend entirely upon their remitting directly to us that is, in anti-editorial language, to L. A. Godey, Philadelphia.

We copy the following from the "Ohio Democratic Standard," as we think it defines our true position:—

"Godey has hit the nail on the head in giving articles of practical utility and useful knowledge; the poetry of the arts and sciences of practical life is much more substantial and useful than the ethereal notions of the old poetical dreamers, whose fancies were much more in place before the era of steam-engines and telegraphs than now, and Godey is just the man to appreciate and meet the demand of the times."

LETTER FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

"TAKESWELL C. H., Va.

"MY DEAR GODEY: I shall be in Philadelphia on a visit some time during autumn. This country is so lovely at this season that I wish you could only see it. What with mountain, valley, and river—trees, cascades, dells, and dingles, with a thousand stories of Indian warfare and early foray, and the rude, but picturesque cabins of the settlers, the place affords a most delightful residence for the man of business desirous of relaxation, as well as an almost inexhaustible theme for the poet and romance-writer. This, you know, was at one time a part of 'the dark and bloody ground,' and abounds in Indian camps, battle-grounds, and spots of refuge.

"Hoping the 'Book' continues to flourish, and you as well, like a green bay-tree, and with a hope to see you in September, at the old 'den,' in Chestnut Street,

"I remain, as ever, yours truly, T. D. E."

HERE IS AN IDEA!—One of our contemporaries, speaking of the husband of Madame Alboni, says: "He is a count, and a very handsome, gay, dashing young fellow. A more elegantly-dressed man you never saw; but he is immensely aristocratic." A man / who depends upon his wife's exertions for his meals being "immensely aristocratic!" Pshaw!

BALTIMORE FEMALE COLLEGE.—We are happy to hear, from an old friend and contributor, that this institution is now fully established in the esteem and confidence of the public. The President of the College, Nathan C. Brooks, A. M., is a fine scholar, and a most amiable and worthy gentleman, and fully competent to preside over an institution established for the purpose of "developing the intellectual, social, and moral faculties of females; and, by imparting a thorough, practical, accomplished, and Christian education, fit the female for the discharge of those duties that await her in life." In connection with this subject, we have the pleasure of referring to the "Parthenian; or, Young Ladies' Magazine," the first number of which has been received. Its pages are filled with the contributions of the young ladies of the college, and, in its literary merits, embellishments, and letter-press, is highly creditable to the institution.

LOUIS NAPOLEON.—This personage, as our readers well know, has been deservedly made the subject of much indignant denunciation, as well as of ridicule and satire, by those who have condemned his usurpation and subsequent acts of tyranny. Of the latter class, is a work which we briefly referred to in our July number, entitled the "Poems of Napoleon." The hits aimed by the author of that work at the insincerity and treachery of the usurping President, generally strike home, and fall with great severity and justice, forming, at the same time, amusing contrasts in the life, actions, and professions of the brilliant imitator of his uncle. The following parody of "Poe's Raven," is said to be a pretty faithful picture of Napoleon's life in London:—

"Once in London—lone and dreary—as I pondered, slightly beery,
Over many a small account and bill with which one's tradesmen bore,
While I dreamt the bench of knapping, suddenly there came a tapping,
As of some dun slyly rapping, rapping at my garret door.
'Tis one of these same scamps,' I muttered, 'tapping at my garret door.

'Tis a most confounded bore.'

"In that drear and dull November often dreamt I, o'er the ember,
Of a certain hook-nosed member of the Jewish creed, who bore
A writ—which made me fear the morrow—vainly having tried to borrow;
So I pined in fruitless sorrow, thinking of the Emperore—
Of that hero who, if living, would be safe to swell my store,
Than which I needed—nothing more.

"Feeling, therefore, quite reliant—I'd no tin to make him pliant—
That, as I was there confant, he would ope the chamber door;
Deep I pondered if on slim knee, I could clamber up the chimney;
Thus escaping from his talons for a fortnight so or more;
If indeed, I could not manage to attain another shore,
Leaving Levi to deplore."

ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE. IMPORTANT REDUCTION IN CLUB PRICES.—By reference to the cover of the "Lady's Book" for this month, will be found the prospectus for a new volume of "Arthur's Home Gazette," in which is announced a reduction of club prices to a rate so low, that subscribers in clubs of twenty can now procure the paper at one dollar each per annum.

This ably-conducted journal has now attained a high position among its literary contemporaries, and, indeed, from the peculiarity of that position, may be said to stand without a rival. In saying this, we conceive we do no injustice to any other of the Philadelphia weeklies—we certainly intend none—for they all have their peculiar excellences. But "Arthur's Home Gazette," being almost exclusively the reflex of the genius, the tact, and the industry of Mr. Arthur himself, may fairly claim a distinction which belongs to no other literary paper in the Union. As a writer of sound morals, the editor of the "Home Gazette" has probably effected more for the cause of virtue and humanity than any other of our American writers. In his noble efforts for the amelioration of society, he has not confined himself to any one class, but has carried his benevolent warnings and instructions from the lowest and humblest fireplaces up to the loftiest dwellings of aristocracy and splendid misery, gently reproving all, but inspiring all to pursue the better path, with language of hope and friendship.

This, as it always has been, continues to be the peculiar course of the "Home Gazette," a course which must ever sustain it as a most pleasing, as well as a most valuable and necessary monitor and guide to the family circle. As such a paper, we now, as on former occasions, take pleasure in commending it to the readers of the "Lady's Book."

Hieretofore, the price of the "Home Gazette," in clubs, has been considerably higher than the literary weeklies of Philadelphia and New York. Even with this disadvantage, the paper, from the popularity of its editor, and the high character which he has given to it from the first, has attained a circulation greater, with a single exception, than any other weekly of its class in Philadelphia; and this within the singularly brief period of two years. We are glad to see that the publishers have determined to give it a wider sphere of usefulness, by such a reduction of price as will place it within the reach of every one.

THE YANKEE BLADE.—We observe, by the prospectus of the ensuing volume of this sterling weekly, that numerous improvements are contemplated by the editor, which will add very greatly to the merits of the paper, if that be possible. Like all the really good periodicals of the day, the "Blade" occupies a position of its own, perfectly independent, and, we might say, perfectly original in all its features and departments. If, however, the industrious editor can improve, we know he will, and therefore take his word for the fact. We hope for his success with the public, having no doubt of his own success in whatever he proposes to do for its benefit.

Centre-Table Gossip.

NEVER did a party of young girls pass a summer afternoon, or a winter evening together, that "love" was not at one time their theme. See it for yourselves, fair readers, if you think this is not so; and note, besides, how many under twenty years of age have the least perception of what the word implies. With some, its elements are flattering attentions, costly presents, a fine face, and good figure. Others have danced themselves into the belief that the best waltzer of the winter will make the best husband. A third is sure she must be in love, because she dotes on sentimental songs, and "somebody" pays soft and devoted attention when she sings them. Another has a heart so large that she can be engaged to two at once, or perhaps three, meanwhile weighing their respective merits. Most of the party have formed their notion of the emotion from the popular tales and novels of the day, where love at first sight is principally advocated. But few look at home, and see what preserves the altar-fire bright in the midst of the rude blasts of adversity, or the thousand trials that go to make up "the woes of this troublesome life." Differing from their thoughts or intents is the sentiment of the little poem we subjoin, which we commend not less for its gracefulness than its truth:—

TRUE LOVE.

BY JOSIAH CONDER.

'Twas not when early flowers were springing,
When skies were shewn,
And wheat was green,
And birds of love were singing,
That first I loved thee, or that thou
Didst first the tender claim allow:

For when the silent woods had faded
From green to yellow,
When fields were fallow,
And the changed skies o'ershadied,
My love might then have shared decay,
Or passed with summer's songs away.

'Twas winter: cares and clouds were round me,
Instead of flowers,
And sunny hours,
When Love unguarded found me;

'Mid wintry scenes my passion grew,
And wintry cares have proved it true.

Dear are the hours of summer weather,
When all is bright,
And hearts are light,
And Love and Nature joy together:
But stars from night their lustre borrow,
And hearts are closer twined by sorrow.

SELECTION OF PAPER HANGINGS.

Our housekeeping readers cannot fail to be interested in the following simple rules, on which the cheerfulness of home so much depends.

According to the taste or judgment with which the pattern is chosen, so will the appearance of the room, when papered, be agreeable or displeasing. Large patterns should, of course, be only used in large rooms. Dark-tinted papers are most suitable for light rooms, and light papers for dark rooms; many a dingy or gloomy apartment may be made to wear a cheerful aspect by attention to this particular. Stripes, whether on a lady's dress, or on the walls of a room, always give the effect of height; consequently a low room is improved by being hung with a striped paper. The effect is produced by a wavy stripe as well as a straight one, and, as curved lines are the most graceful, they should generally be preferred. Any pattern with lines crossed so as to form a square, is unsuitable for a low room; but, with the lines made sloping or diagonal, there is not the same objection. A diamond trellis pattern, with a small plant creeping over it, looks well in a small summer parlor. For a common sitting-room, a small geometrical pattern is very suitable; being well covered, it does not show accidental stains or bruises, and, in the constant repetition of the design, there is no one object to attract the eye more than another. These are sometimes called Elizabethan patterns; they are much used for staircases, halls, and passages, but they are not to be chosen at random. According to the height and dimensions of the passage or staircase, such should be the pattern. A large pattern on a narrow staircase, and in a passage not more than eight feet in height, has a very heavy and disagreeable effect. A light gray, or yellow marble, divided into blocks by thin lines, and varnished, will be found suitable for most passages, if care be taken to adapt the size of the blocks to the place where they are to appear. A size that would look well in a hall twenty feet wide, would be altogether too large in one of only four or six feet. Many persons must have noticed, in their visits of business or pleasure, that some houses present a cheerful aspect as soon as the door is opened, while others look so dull that they make one low-spirited upon entering them. The difference is caused by the good or bad taste with which they have been papered and painted.

A safe rule with regard to paper-hangings, is to choose nothing that looks extravagant or unnatural. Regard should be had to the uses of an apartment; a drawing-room should be light and cheerful, a parlor should look warm and comfortable without being gloomy; bedroom papers should be cool and quiet, and generally of a small pattern, and of such colors as harmonize with bed-furniture and other fittings. It is worth while to consider the sort of pictures to be hung on a wall; gilt frames show best on a dark ground, and dark frames on a light ground; taking care, however, to avoid violent contrasts. Heavy borders are seldom used now; they make a room low, without being ornamental.

GOOD THINGS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE "Blithedale Romance" abounds, as may be supposed, in many a beautiful sentiment and lifelike landscape; but, to our eyes, there is not a more natural touch than the following:—

"At the window of the next story, two children, prettily dressed, were looking out. By and by, a middle-aged gentleman came softly behind them, kissed the little girl, and playfully pulled the little boy's ear. It was a papa, no doubt, just come in from his counting-room or office; and anon appeared mamma, stealing as softly behind papa as he had stolen behind the children, and laying her hand on his shoulder to surprise him. Then followed a kiss between papa and mamma, but a noiseless one, for the children did not turn their heads.

"I bless God for these good folks," thought I to myself. "I have not seen a prettier bit of nature in all my summer in the country, than they have shown me here in a rather stylish boarding-house."

The kisses of all papas and mammas in public are not noiseless, as we lately had occasion to notice on the deck of a steamboat, when the parting salute of an affectionate couple reverberated, we had almost said, above the hiss of steam. But here is an admirable description of the coming on of fever, which most of our readers can acknowledge from painful experience:—

"The night proved a feverish one. Through the greater part of it, I was in that vilest of states when a fixed idea remains in the mind, like the nail in Sisyra's brain, while innumerable other ideas go and come, and flutter to and fro, combining instant transition with intolerable sameness."

In the admirably sketched book of Mrs. Moodie, which displays so much of woman's best virtues, endurance and perseverance, we find the following homely, but valuable receipt for making coffee from the roots of the common dandelion:—

"I cut my roots into small pieces, the size of a kidney-bean, and roasted them on an iron baking-pan in the stove-oven, until they were as brown and crisp as coffee. I then ground and transferred a small cupful of the powder to the coffee-pot, pouring upon it scalding water, and boiling it for a few minutes briskly over the fire. The result was beyond my expectations. The coffee proved excellent—far superior to the common coffee we procured at the stores.

"The time of gathering in the potato crop is the best suited for collecting and drying the roots of the dandelion; and, as they always abound in the same hills, both may be accomplished at the same time. Those who want to keep a quantity for winter use may wash and cut up the roots, and dry them on boards in the sun. They will keep for years, and can be roasted when required.

"Few of our colonists are acquainted with the many uses to which this neglected, but most valuable plant may be applied. I will point out a few which have come under my own observation, convinced as I am that the time will come when this hardy weed, with its golden flowers and curious seed-vessels, which form a constant plaything to the little children rolling about and luxuriating among the grass in the sunny month of May, will be transplanted into our gardens, and tended with due care. The dandelion, planted in trenches, and blanched to a beautiful cream-color with straw, makes an excellent salad, quite equal to endive, and is more hardy, and requires less care.

"In many parts of the United States, particularly in new districts where vegetables are scarce, it is used early in the spring, and boiled with pork as a substitute for cabbage. During our residence in the bush, we found it, in the early part of May, a great addition to the dinner-table. In the township of Dummer, the settlers boil the tops, and add hops to the liquor, which they ferment, and from which they obtain excellent beer. I have never tasted this simple beverage; but I have been told, by those who use it, that it is equal to the table-beer used at home."

OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

So many are the queries which we, as a "Lady's Book," are expected to solve, that we have concluded to establish this well-known corner, to be devoted to any chance questions that our friends may wish responded to. We are certainly always most happy to give them any advice or information in our power.

ANNA—can procure the materials for making paper flowers at several of the stationery stores in the principal Atlantic cities. The stamens, leaves, etc., to finish the bouquet, are sold by the manufacturers of artificial flowers, readily to be found by any one who undertakes the commission. It is a fashion now somewhat out of vogue, from the bad taste exhibited by many who practised it, looking everywhere else but to nature for models; though we have seen bouquets and baskets very naturally and tastefully disposed. The most beautiful spray we ever recollect was shown us not long since, and composed of parched corn, with a few green leaves. Though this seems almost impossible at first, if our readers will notice the fantastic, and sometimes exquisite shapes into which the kernels expand, they will see that some are almost perfect roses, violets, etc., the petals being formed by the pure white. To form the stamens, bits of sewing-silk are dipped into wax, or ground rice, and then colored. The blossoms are naturally arranged upon stems, grouped, and fastened upon a sheet of white paper, or card-board, and are not only deceptive, but really beautiful.

E. M.—Broiderie Anglaise is a term applied to the heavy, open-worked cambric edging now so fashionable for undersleeves and under-clothing: it is simply "English embroidery." The pattern is formed entirely of a succession of holes, variously arranged and worked around. If desired, we will give directions in our next.

Fashions.

CHITCHAT FOR SEPTEMBER.

The continued warm weather forbidding a return to town, or any activity in the display of new fashions, we cannot interest our readers more than to quote for their benefit some invaluable hints on dresses, taken from the "London Quarterly." We wish we had space for the whole article; as it is, we know of very few ladies in city or country but may be benefited by the taste and common sense—a rare combination—which these extracts display.

The true object and importance of taste in dress few women understand. "Even if woman had been made as ugly as we," says the author, "she would still, no doubt, have been the object of our highest intellectual devotion; but woman was made 'exceedingly fair,' a creature not only fitted for all the deference and homage our minds could bestow, but obviously intended for the most elegant wardrobes and brilliant broussous our pockets could furnish. But, however we may fall short of our duty to the sex in this latter respect, let no woman therefore suppose that any man can be really indifferent to her appearance. The instinct may be deadened in his mind by a slatternly, negligent mother, or by plain maiden sisters; but she may be sure it is there, and, with a little adroitness, capable of revival. Of course, the immediate effect of a well-chosen feminine toilet operates differently in different minds. In some, it causes a sense of actual pleasure; in others, a consciousness of passive enjoyment. In some, it is intensely felt while it is present; in others, only missed when it is gone.

"Such being the case, the responsibility of a wife in this department is a very serious one. In point of fact, she dresses for two, and, in neglecting herself, virtually annoys her husband. Nature has expressly assigned her as the only safe investment for his vanities; and she who wantonly throws them back from their natural course, deserves to see them break out on his own person.

"But, independent of the plain law of instinct, there is one for the promotion of dress among ladies, which may be plainer still to some—and this is the law of self-interest. Will Honeycomb says he can tell the humor a woman is in by the color of her hood. We go farther, and maintain that, to a proficient in the science, every woman walks about with a placard, on which her leading qualities are advertised.

"For instance, you meet one, no matter whether pale or rosy, fat or thin, who is always noticeable for something singular and outré in her dress; a hat with all the colors of the rainbow, or of a new color never imagined before; a gown so trimmed that she cannot lean back upon it; a cloak so cut that she cannot walk upright in it; a new kind of quilling which scratches her, and catches everybody else; a new pattern which blinds the eyes to look at; a berthé strung of beads from Nova Zembla; a boa woven of feathers from New Zealand; and if, further, she wears them with a piteous and dejected look, as if she were a martyr to the service, you may be sure this is a shy, timid, weak soul, who, while she is attracting all eyes to her costume, has no other thought than how she may best escape observation. This is a prize to milliners, whose insight into human nature through the gauze it wears is all for our argument, and who, seeing immediately that she has neither taste nor judgment of her own, can always persuade her to lead some forlorn hope, called 'the very last fashion,' but a fashion in which no one else would have the courage to be first.

"Again, if, after the first unfortunate has passed on her way, you meet another equally extravagant in her style, only with this difference, that she has opinions of her own, and these of the most pronounced kind; if she wear the largest pattern and the gaudiest colors upon the most ordinary material, or the highest flounces upon the richest; if, being poor, she has a quantity of show lace, mock fur, or false jewelry, showing that her object is not economy, but display; or if, being rich, she mixes up the best together, pearls on head, cameos on neck, diamonds on stomacher; if she disposes her hair in inordinate long curls or extraordinarily curious braids; and if, beneath a skirt which covers an incredible circumference of ground, or beneath a body which hardly covers any space at all, you catch glimpses of substances neither neat, clean, nor fine—you may guess this is a vain, vulgar, and perhaps bold woman.

"Far different from those we have hitherto reviewed, are the dress doctrines of her who next follows, though not so well exemplified in details as in general. Her first study seems to be the becoming, her second the good, her third the fashionable, which, if it be both good and becoming, it always is, or may be. You see this lady turning a cold eye to the assurances of shopmen and the recommendations of milliners. She cares not how original a pattern may be, if it be ugly, or how recent a shape, if it be awkward. Whatever, therefore, fashion dictates, she follows laws of her own, and is never behind it. She wears very beautiful things, which people generally suppose to be fetched from Paris, or at least made by a French milliner; but which, as often as not, are bought at the nearest town, and made up by her own maid. Not that her costume is always either rich or new; on the contrary, she wears many a cheap dress, but it is always pretty; and many an old one, but it is always good. Not a scrap of tinsel or trumpery appears upon her. She puts no faith in velvet bands, or gilt buttons, or twisted cordings. She is quite aware, however, that the garnish is as important as the dress; all her inner borders and beadings are delicate and fresh, and should anything peep out which is not intended to be seen, the same scrupulous care is observable. After all, there is no great art either in her fashions or her materials. The secret simply consists in her knowing the three grand unities of dress—her own station, her own age, and her own points. And no woman can dress well who does not. After this, we need not say that whoever is attracted by the costume will not be disappointed in the wearer. She may not be handsome, nor accomplished, but we will answer for her being even-tempered, well informed, thoroughly sensible, and a complete lady.

"Upon the whole, a prudent and sensible man, desirous of 'looking before he leaps,' may safely predicate of the inner lining from the outer garment, and be thankful that he has this, at least, to go by. That there are such things as female pirates, who hang out false lights to entrap unwary travellers, we do not deny. It is only to be hoped that, sooner or later, they may catch a Tartar on their coats. For, of all the various denominations of swindlers who practise on the goodness or the weakness of mankind, that woman is the basest who is a dandy during courtship, and a dowdy after marriage.

"As regards an affection not unfrequent in the sex, that of apathy towards the affairs of the toilet, we can only assure them, for their own sakes, that there is not a worse kind of affection going. A woman, to be indifferent to her own appearance, must either be hardened to all female tastes and perceptions, or an immense heiress, or a first-rate beauty, or think herself one."

into human nature through argument, and who, seeing immediately that one has her taste nor judgment of her own, can always persuade her to lead some forlorn hope, called 'the very last fashion,'

} nine times over,
 first-rate beauty, or think herself one.

EVERYDAY ACTUALITIES.—NO. V.

BY C. T. HINCKLEY.

A DAY'S RAMBLE THROUGH THE MECHANICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE "LADY'S BOOK."

IN order to furnish our articles as much as possible from practical observation, we commence on what we think will be an interesting subject to the numerous thousand readers of the "Book"—a description of the labor which is required in furnishing the monthly amount of reading and instruction emanating from its office. There are doubtless many of its readers who are totally unacquainted, from their various positions in society, with the vast amount of capital and labor required in its publication, to whom an insight into its mechanical operations will be a matter of some interest. They will then have a definite idea of the tact and enterprise which have been so successfully applied for the last twenty-three years by its indefatigable proprietor, who, we are glad to record, has received substantial evidences of the appreciation of his endeavors, by the reading public of the two worlds—for the "Lady's Book" numbers among its readers some thousands in Europe.

TYPE-SETTING DEPARTMENT.

Premising that the manuscript, or "copy," as it is termed by the printer, after having been read and approved by the editors, has preceded us to the printing-office of Messrs. T. K. & P. G. Collins, we invite the attention of our readers as we trace its progress through the various departments of their extensive establishment until a copy of a finished number of the "Lady's Book" is placed in their hands. The manuscript, on its arrival at the office, is placed in the care of the foreman of the "Lady's Book" department, who gives it out as it is required by the "compositors," or printers who set the types. The "composing-room," that is, the room in which the workmen who set the types are employed, is one of very large size, in the shape of a letter U, running back 140 feet, and having facilities for the accommodation of fifty-six printers, with their cases. The "cases," a representation of which is given in one of our illustrations, are boxes containing all the letters of the alphabet, punctuation-marks, &c., arranged in various sizes and situations to suit the number and frequency of use of the letters. The "upper case" is divided into ninety-eight partitions, all of equal size; and these partitions contain two sets of capital letters, the one called "capitals," the other "small capitals;" the marks of reference, and figures and dashes. The "lower case" is divided into partitions of four different sizes, some at the top and ends being a little smaller than those of the upper case; others near the centre being equal to two of the small divisions; others equal to four, and one to six. In all there are fifty-three divisions in the lower case. The proportions of the letters, as they apply to the English language, are as follows in a regular "fount" of letters:—

|----------|---------|---------|---------|---------|
| a 8,500  | g 1,700 | l 4,000 | q 500   | v 1,200 |
| b 1,600  | h 6,400 | m 3,000 | r 6,200 | w 2,000 |
| c 3,000  | i 8,000 | n 8,000 | s 8,000 | x 400   |
| d 4,400  | j 400   | o 8,000 | t 9,000 | y 2,000 |
| e 12,000 | k 800   | p 1,700 | u 3,400 | z 200.  |
| f 2,500  |         |         |         |         |

In the case, these letters are not arranged in regular rotation; but such as are in most general use are placed together in the centre, where they are the easiest to be picked up, and the others in semi-alphabetical order around in the outside boxes. The inventor of this system of arrangement was a great benefactor to printers, as it enables them to accomplish a much larger amount of work than could be done were they in rotation. The facility which is displayed by a compositor in picking up types is a matter of much surprise to strangers to the art. The surprise is generally connected with an idea that the compositor would do his work more correctly if the boxes were labelled. So far from that being the case, it is a fact that in two or three days a boy can learn the exact situation of each letter.

But to return to our manuscript: after it is given into the compositor's charge, he places it upon his case, with a "guide," to keep it in its place. Standing before his pair of cases, he holds in his left hand what is called a "composing-stick." This is a little iron frame, one side of which is movable, so that it may be adjusted to the required width of the page or column which he has to set up. It is made perfectly true and square; for without such accuracy the lines would be of unequal length. This little instrument is represented in the cut above. The practised compositor takes in a line or two at a glance, always provided the author writes an intelligible hand, which virtue is by no means universal! One by one, then, he puts the letters of each word and sentence into his stick, securing each letter with the thumb of his left hand, which is therefore travelling on from the beginning to the end of each line. His right hand goes mechanically to the box which he requires; but his eye is ready to accompany its movements. In each letter there is a nick, or nicks, which indicate the bottom edge of the letter; and the nick must be placed outwards in his composing-stick. Further, the letter must also be placed with the face upwards, so that two right positions must be combined in the arrangement of the types. If the compositor were to pick up the letter at random, he would most probably have to turn it in his hand; and as it is important to save every unnecessary movement, his eye directs him to some one of the heap which lies in the right position, both as regards the face being upwards and the nick outwards. When he arrives at the end of the line, he has a task to perform in which the carefulness of the workman is greatly exhibited. Each type is of a constant thickness, so far as regards that particular letter, though all the letters are not of the same thickness. The adjustments, therefore, to complete the line with a word, or, at any rate, with a syllable, must be made by varying the thickness of the spaces between each word. A good compositor is distinguished by uniformity of spacing: he will not allow the words to be very close together in some instances, or with a large gap between them in others. When the workman has "filled his stick," as it is called—that is, set up as many lines as it will conveniently hold—he lifts them out into what is termed a "galley," by grasping them with the fingers of each hand, and thus taking them up as if they were a solid piece of metal. The facility with which some compositors can lift out what is termed a "handful" of movable types without deranging a single letter is very remarkable. This sort of skill can only be obtained by practice; and thus one of the severest mortifications a young printer can experience is to see his labor of an hour knocked to pieces, or into what is called "pie."

After the galleys have been filled with types, the foreman "makes them up" into pages by putting the "head line" with a sufficient blank beneath to give it uniformity. He then lifts the number of lines required to fill out a column; then, placing a brass column rule (which makes the waved line seen between each column of a page) along-side of them, he lifts a like number of lines, and thus forms a page. The page is then "locked up" by placing it in a "chase," a small wrought-iron frame capable of holding two pages, and wedging it in by "quoins," which are small pieces of wood with a slight bevel on one side, which has the effect of making the pages tight according to the extent to which the quoins are driven up. When the pages are thus locked up, although each page contains about six thousand little pieces of metal or types, they can be handled the same as if they were a solid body of metal. After locking up, the pages are taken to the "proof-press," where impressions are taken upon paper, in order that the mistakes of the compositor can be rectified. The work of the "proof-reader," of which there are five in the Messrs. Collins's office, is one requiring great care and knowledge. The peculiar nature of the printing art is such that it is almost impossible for a compositor to set any amount of types without some errors creeping in. The ordinary process of proof-reading is for a boy to read the copy aloud, whilst the reader follows him on the proof impression. As he proceeds, the errors detected are marked upon the margin of the sheet, which, after it has been read, is given to the compositor for correction. This is called the first reading. After the page is corrected, another proof is taken, called a "revise," which is compared with the first proof to see if the errors are corrected; when, if the copy of the work be manuscript, the sheet is sent to the author for examination. If the errors detected by the author are sufficiently numerous, the sheet is again corrected, and another revise is taken. It is then carefully read once more by the proof-reader. This is designated the second reading; and the object of this reading is not simply to glean such typographical or literal errors as may have escaped notice on the first reading, but to detect errors in grammar and punctuation, and even in style, when the latter are so obvious as to be merely oversights of the author. Yet, in spite of all the pains taken both by author and proof-reader, the most provoking errors are sometimes found in works after they are published. When the sheet is finally corrected for the press, the compositor's work is for the time at an end; but when it is printed off, or when a stereotype cast has been taken, it is his business to return the types to the cases from which they were taken. This operation is called "distribution." It is a most beautiful process in the hands of an expert compositor, and probably no act which is partly mental and partly mechanical offers a more remarkable example of the dexterity to be acquired by long practice. The workman, holding a quantity of type in his left hand as it has been arranged in lines, keeping the face towards him, takes up one or two words between the forefinger and thumb of his right hand, and drops the letters, each into its proper place, with almost inconceivable rapidity. His mind has to follow the order of the letters in the words, and to select the box into which each is to be dropped, while his fingers have to separate each letter from the other, taking care that not more than one is dropped at a time. This is a complicated act, and yet a good compositor will distribute three or four times as fast as he composes; that is, he will return to their proper places 50,000 letters in a day. The preceding engraving represents a compositor working at his case, with a "form" of the "Lady's Book" and a "galley" leaning against the left-hand side of it.

STEREOTYPE DEPARTMENT.

The pages having been carefully corrected, they are taken to the stereotype foundry, where we will follow them and explain the process which they have to undergo previous to being returned to the printing-office to be "worked off."

The first operation is that of taking a mould from each page of movable type. The pages are not arranged as they would be combined in a sheet and wedged up together in one iron frame or chase, but each page is put in a separate chase. It is essential that the face of the types should be perfectly clean and dry, that no particle of dirt or other substance should attach to the bottom of the types, so as to prevent them being completely level upon the surface. The page is now placed in the lower part of a moulding-frame. The upper part of the frame is somewhat larger than the page, and the margin of mould thus formed determines the thickness of the plate. The types being previously rubbed over with an oily composition, gypsum (plaster of Paris) is poured evenly over the whole surface. Almost every one knows that this substance, although moulded in a liquid state, sets very quickly, and soon becomes perfectly solid. There is a good deal of nicety required from the workmen, not only in forming the mould, but in removing it from the type: if any part of the plaster adheres to the face of the type, the mould of course is imperfect, and the operation must be gone over again. To prevent this, considerable care is required in the preparation of the gypsum, and much neatness of hand in separating the mould from the page. Having been removed and found perfect, it requires some dressing with a knife on its edges, and several notches are cut in the margin to allow the metal to enter the mould. It is now fit for baking. This process also requires a good deal of accurate knowledge. The oven, in which the moulds are placed upon the ledges, must be kept at a very regular temperature, for, if it be too hot, the moulds will warp. The process of casting begins when the moulds have been baked sufficiently long to be perfectly dry and hard. The casting-pan which contains the mould is represented in the preceding cut.

At the bottom of the pan is a movable plate of cast-iron called a floating-plate, and upon this plate, the face of which is perfectly accurate, the mould is placed with the face downwards. Upon the back of the mould the cover of the casting-pan, the inside face of whose lid is also perfectly true, is laid. The cover is held tightly down by a screw connected with two shackles, as shown in the cut on the preceding page; and also by two nippers belonging to the apparatus for plunging the pan into the metal-pit, as shown in the cut of the stereotype foundry. This apparatus, which is attached to a crane, is so constructed as to swing with a perfectly horizontal motion, and the casting-pan with the mould being thus suspended over the metal-pit, is gradually forced down into the molten mass, and there kept steady

by a lever and weight. The lid of the pan, it will be observed, is cut off at the corners, and it is through these spaces that the metal enters the box and insinuates itself into every hollow. When the box is plunged into the metal, a bubbling noise is heard, which is caused by the expulsion of the air within the box. After having remained immersed for about ten minutes, it is steadily lifted out by the crane and swung to a cooling-trough, in which the under side of the box is exposed to water. Being completely cooled, the caster proceeds to remove the mould from the casting-box. The plaster mould, the plate moulded, and the floating-plate are all solidly fixed up together. The metal, by its specific gravity, has forced it under the floating-plate, which it has consequently driven tightly up against the ledges of the mould. The mould has in the same way been tightly forced up against the lid of the casting-pan. The notches in the ledge of the mould have at the same time admitted the metal into the minutest impression from the face of the types. The caster now breaks off the superfluous metal and the ledges of the mould with a wooden mallet, as shown in the wood-cut. The mould is of course destroyed, and if another plate is required, another mould must be taken from the types. After the superfluous metal and the plaster are removed, the stereotype plate comes out bright and well formed; but the plate is not yet complete; its proper thickness cannot be determined by the mould alone, and the back is therefore shaved down in a peculiar kind of machine, which acts in the same manner as a plane, taking the back off perfectly smooth.

The very best casting cannot prevent occasional defects in the face of the plate. It requires, therefore, to be minutely examined by a workman called a picker. It is his business to remove the small globules of metal which occasionally fill up such letters as the n, and the e, to insert a new letter, which he can do by soldering if any one be broken; and what is a still more delicate operation, to remove with his graver any impurities which fill up the lines of a wood-cut. To execute this latter duty properly he ought to be in some degree an artist, and possess the keen eye and steady hand of an engraver.

The advantages of stereotyping for the advancement of literature are incalculable. It makes knowledge cheap, by giving publishers the power of issuing any number of editions of a work without the expense of resetting the type, which enables them to publish at lower rates. The inherent difficulty of the business of a publisher consists in the mistakes he may make in calculating the demand for any particular book. The demand for articles of physical necessity does not greatly vary. The demand for books depends in a certain degree upon fashion, and the prevailing current of public opinion. In books of a merely temporary interest, or which are addressed only to particular classes, or deal with particular modes of thought, a publisher often loses very considerably by over printing; but with the advantages of stereotyping, a small edition of any work can be worked off in a few days, and, as it is sold, the stock can be replenished. The investment of capital thus saved can be used in other works, and the mass of our literature cheapened and vastly extended.

PRESS-ROOM DEPARTMENT.

After the pages have been submitted to the skill of the stereotyper, they are again returned to the printing-office, there to receive the attention of the pressman and his fair assistants—the Messrs. Collins employing, besides a sufficient number of men, about twenty-five young women in this department of their office. This room is in the second story of the building, and is also in the shape of the letter U, and contains fourteen power-presses, which are worked by steam, and seven hand-presses. This room is an object of special attraction to those strangers who, through the courtesy of the proprietors, are allowed to inspect the operations of their extensive establishment. We cannot say whether the attraction is in the beautiful working of the machinery, or in the faces of the bevy of industrious working girls who attend there.

When the pages of any work are not stereotyped, the type is “imposed,” or arranged so that when folded the pages will come in their proper places, upon a large “imposing-stone,” made of marble or cast-iron. After having been arranged correctly, strips of metal called “furniture,” of the requisite width to give the margin of white paper required, are placed around them, and, with the aid of iron bevelled “side” and “foot-sticks” running the width and length of one side only, they are “locked up” in a “chase,” with quoins. The chase is a wrought-iron frame about half an inch thick and an inch broad, and is made of different sizes to suit the different forms of pages required. The forms are of different sizes, the largest containing forty-eight pages, and the smallest four pages, or quarto. They are generally called after the number of pages used: as 12mo. twelve pages; 16mo. sixteen pages; 32mo. thirty-two pages; and octavo, or eight pages. The form of the “Lady’s Book” is a 12mo., or superroyal octavo, and the weight, when set in type, is about three hundred pounds. In order to facilitate the transmission of these heavy forms from the composing-room to the press-room, a large hoisting-machine is arranged which is worked by steam, and runs from the cellar to the garret, boxed completely in, with a door at each story. When the pages to be printed are stereotyped, a requisite number of blocks made for the purpose are locked up in a form in the same manner as if they were type. These blocks are an eighth of an inch less in height than type, so that when the stereotype plate is fastened upon them they will be of the exact height of type, which is very essential, as the heavy pressure of all presses is calculated for the type to be seven-eighths of an inch high, and any deviation from that height would prevent a correct impression being made. The edges of stereotype plates have a bevel, which is so made in order that they may be clamped on to the block by means of a set of two small clamps, which are attached to all blocks, for that purpose; so that the same blocks can answer for the pages of any book of the same size.

The form being locked up and sent by the hoisting-machine to the press-room, the foreman who has charge of the press-work of the “Lady’s Book” takes it in hand. We would here remark that much of the looks of a work depends upon the quality of the paper and ink used in its production, and it is not always a proof of a want of skill in the engraver or printer if the work should not look well, but is in most cases attributable to the quality of ink and paper used. The presses used by the Messrs. Collins are from the manufactories of Adams, and of Tufts, and are considered the best in use for book work. The following engraving will give an idea of one of these presses. The blank paper is placed upon a frame on the top of the press in front of the attendant, who takes a sheet and places it on the receiving-board; here it is caught by nippers constructed for that purpose, and carried to its position on the form between the bed and platen, where it receives an impression. It then returns under the receiving-board, and, by the use of bellows, is raised and caught between tapes which are constantly in motion, and carried on the fly, which lays it over on the table at the end of the press. Immediately upon the printed sheet leaving the face of the type, a set of ink-rollers pass over them and re-ink them, when another sheet passes over, and in this manner the inking and printing go on as long as the press is kept in motion. These presses are capable of throwing off seven hundred and fifty printed sheets in an hour.

One of the most important inventions relating to speed in printing-presses is that of the "composition-roller." The old plan of inking a form was by two "balls," or large pads stuffed with wool and covered with chamois skin, which were used by an assistant, generally a man, as much strength was required. The mode of using them was necessarily a slow operation, as they were taken, one in each hand, somewhat after the manner of a mince-meat chopper, upon a surface covered with ink: they were then used in a similar manner upon the face of the types. The "composition" now in use is made of glue and molasses boiled to a certain consistency, and then cast in a round copper cylinder of the diameter required. In the centre of the cylinder is placed a "stock," which is a solid round piece of wood, in each end of which is inserted an iron pivot, in order that the roller, when finished, may be made to revolve on an axis, and therefore obtain an equal distribution of ink upon its surface. When the rollers are finished they are placed in an iron frame, in pairs generally, which frame has a handle long enough for the roller-boy to propel the rollers over the whole extent of the form of type. When drawn back from the operation of inking, the rollers rest upon a wooden cylinder six or eight times their diameter, which is turned around with the left hand of the roller-boy by a crank, the right hand being used in giving the rollers a side motion of about six inches. This operation secures to the face of the rollers an equal surface of ink, which gives a regularity to the impression taken by the press. This mode is only used upon hand-presses; in power-presses, it is accomplished by mechanism. Some few years since an improvement was made even upon hand-presses, so that a beautiful mechanical contrivance, worked by steam-power, now supercedes the use of a roller-boy in many offices. All the hand-presses in the office of the Messrs. Collins are supplied with this patent "roller-boy," which is the idea of the elder Mr. Collins.

In the printing of colors the same process is required; with this difference, that all sheets printed in black require but one passage through the press, those in colors requiring just as many as there are colors. Experiments are now being made, however, and with some success, in which many colors can be impressed upon a sheet of paper at one time. For a specimen of the skill exercised in printing colors in this establishment, our readers are referred to the model cottages and other colored plates in the back numbers of the "Lady's Book."

DRYING DEPARTMENT.

After the sheets come from the hands of the pressman, they are taken by the warehouseman, who hangs them upon "racks" to dry. In this room, occupying the whole of the upper portion of the building, an immense number of sheets, the work of the twenty-one presses, are hung up daily. The racks are arranged two deep, and about two feet apart throughout the whole of the fourth story, and a part of the third. The sight of this room, with its thousands of sheets, strikes the beholder with astonishment at the vast amount of capital and labor required to conduct this extensive establishment.

From the drying-room the sheets are carried into another room, where they are put between press-boards and submitted to a heavy pressure, by hydraulic and other power, and are then sent to the binders to be made in numbers, from whence they are placed in the hands of the public.

As an evidence of the amount of paper used in this establishment, we will state that about two thousand reams of white paper are the stock generally on hand, of the value of about $10,000.

Editors of the country press, or subscribers to the "Book" who may be on a visit to the city, will find this office an object of great interest, and they are here, by authority of the proprietors, cordially invited to visit it. It is situated in Lodge Alley, three or four doors above Seventh. Lodge Alley is the first cross street above Chestnut.

In the full page engraving of the interior of the office, only one-third of each department is given; owing to the peculiar shape of the rooms, they could not fully be represented in one view.

We will here remark that all the improvements of the day tending to facilitate business or personal comfort are adopted in this model printing-office. We are under many obligations to the proprietors and their assistants for many of the facts here collected, and we tender them our thanks for their attention and courtesy.

VIEW OF MESSRS. COLLINS'S OFFICE FROM THE INNER COURT.

In some future number we will give an extended history of the invention and progress of the art of printing, and the manufacture of paper.

As we have before stated, the office at which the composition and press-work of the "Lady's Book" are done, is the largest in the city, and one of the largest in the country, and belongs to the brothers Collins, two men who, in their character, habits, and friendship, are more like the "brothers Cheeryble" of Dickens than any two in this country. Kind and benevolent in their feelings, gentlemanly and affable in their manners, they are venerated by the hands in their employ, and respected by all who have the pleasure of their acquaintance. The round, good-humored countenance of the elder brother is a sure index of goodness of heart, which his every action proves. The business portion of the labor of the office falling upon him, has rendered their establishment prosperous in the extreme, from his uniform attention and obliging disposition. Rising from the humblest walks of life into a position of wealth and influence, we feel that a short history of their lives would be interesting to their numerous friends, and acceptable to our readers. Their great-grandfather on the father's side was an Irishman, who emigrated to this country when it was a colony, and located himself in Rhode Island. The great-grandfather on the mother's side was a Welshman, and was a lawyer by profession, and resided on an island in the Delaware called White's Island, which he owned.

In returning to Wales, he was shipwrecked and lost. After his death, the island was taken possession of by those to whom it did not belong. The family not being able to prosecute a suit at law, it was never recovered by the rightful owners. The father of the brothers Collins was a native of Cranston, R. I., and was a sailor by occupation: the mother came from the neighborhood of Trenton, New Jersey. The father dying when the boys were quite young, the mother was left poor with them to struggle for.

The elder brother, TILLINGHAST K. COLLINS, was born on the 14th October, 1802, in the city of Philadelphia. At the age of thirteen, he became errand-boy for the late MATHEW CAREY, whose well-known benevolent qualities no doubt laid the foundation, by example and precept, of the eminent good qualities we have before spoken of in Mr. Collins. There is indeed a remarkable similarity in the habits of the two men; the one, whilst living, striving to be a benefit to his fellow-man, and the other now following him in the same benevolent purpose. Mr. Carey was, during the latter part of his life, the proprietor of a large printing establishment, scattering the seeds of knowledge over the land, and Mr. Collins is now engaged in the same business, and for the same laudable purpose. After being some length of time with Mr. Carey, he went an apprentice to Mr. JAMES MAXWELL, one of the best printers of his day, and who then had one of the largest establishments in the city. Mr. T. K. Collins commenced in the wareroom, and progressed up gradually through the different branches of the business—compositor, pressman, &c.—and, when of age, was considered one of the best pressmen in the city. After his apprenticeship was over, he went to Washington and worked for Peter Force for some time. He then worked for Gales & Scaton, and afterwards for Duff Green. Whilst in the city of Washington, he became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which relation he has continued for twenty-five years. At the age of twenty-one he was married, and has since reared a large family, who all partake of the sound qualities of the father. One of his sons is following the profession of his father, and another is a bookseller. In the year 1831, Mr. Collins commenced the printing business in a small way, having but one hand-press, and no capital but his own industry, perseverance, and integrity. The hardships which he had undergone in his youth taught him a lesson, which induced habits of frugality and economy, which have made him now the proprietor of an extensive office, having fourteen power and seven hand-presses, and employing in its various departments over one hundred hands.

Mr. PHILIP G. COLLINS was born in Philadelphia on the 9th of June, 1804, and also learned the printing business with James Maxwell, and was one of the best compositors in the city, and an excellent pressman. He married young, and has had but one child, a son. He was taken into partnership with his brother two years after he started business. The younger Mr. Collins having been confined more in the office, he is not personally so widely known as the other brother. He is less familiar in his manner, but, when enticed into conversation, the listener is surprised at the fund of information upon every subject which he has stored away in his brain. He has a natural brusqueness of manner, which is only upon the outside, for he is at heart kind and generous, and is much respected by those who are intimately acquainted with him. His health has been much impaired of late, and he is now travelling for the benefit of it, and with some degree of success.

Κυrie Ελεison.—LORD, HAVE MERCY UPON US!

BY REV. H. HASTINGS WELD.

(See Plate.)

THE Great I AM from Sinai spake:
I am the Lord thy God, alone;
No graven image shalt thou make,
No gods set up, before My Throne;
No star in heaven's canopy,
No creature of the earth or air,
No idol of the nether sea,
My jealous honors e'er may share.
Have mercy on us, Lord! Incline
Our hearts to keep Thy Law Divine!

The Heavenly Name on careless tongue
Thou shalt not take, in utterance vain;
For vengeance doth to Him belong
On those His worship who disdain.
To children's children shall descend
The sentence of His broken law;
While thousands shall his love attend,
Who keep His word, in sacred awe.
Have mercy on us, Lord! Incline
Our hearts to keep Thy Law Divine!

Remember that His Sabbath day
Thou sacred keep from servile toll;
Pass not in sloth its hours away,
Nor of true rest thy soul despoil.
His altar in thy dwelling raise,
Let home be happy in His fear;
For He hath promised length of days
To those their parents who revere.
Have mercy on us, Lord! Incline
Our hearts to keep Thy Law Divine!

Pursue no other to his death—
No pleasure follow to thine own;
Defraud not; nor with slanderous breath
Breathe on thy neighbor's fair renown.
Desire or covet no man's pelf,
But rather of thine own impart;
Love thou thy neighbor as thyself,
And love thy God with all thy heart.
Have mercy on us, Lord! Incline
Our hearts to keep Thy Law Divine!

MY AUNT SALLY.

BY KATE KENNARD.

My Aunt Sally was a belle and a beauty in her day—for know, fair maiden, that the terms are not synonymous. Many a beauty never was a belle, and there have been belles who were no beauties. But my Aunt Sally was both, and my happiest occupation in childhood was to rummage the top drawer of her old-fashioned bureau (where was deposited a vast collection of locketts, rings, fans, antiquated billets-doux, and other memorials of lovers and admirers, now passed away or changed into unromantic grandfathers or great uncles), while my Aunt Sally sat by my side and gave the history of each flirtation as it was recalled to her mind. But far more valuable, in a practical point of view, was the moral with which she would point each tale, and the shrewd lessons in feminine tactics which she drew from the stores of her experience.

"Depend upon it, my dear," said she, flirting in her still delicate hand a beautiful fan adorned with figures after Watteau, "depend upon it, my dear, there's no use in loving a man too much; it bewilders you, and is no real satisfaction to him; you lose your presence of mind, and cannot really judge what will please him: it's quite enough to have him comfortably in love with you. Now, this fan—it was given me by a young Frenchman, who came over with Count D'Estaing, that winter we were all shut up in Boston. I do believe he would have left his country and turned republican for my sake, all for the love of 'mes beaux yeux;' but, child, do you think he would have offered to do such a thing if I had shown that I cared very much for him? Not he. Then it would have been quite enough for him to offer to take me off to France, to live in an old tumble-down chateau with his snuffy old father, the marquis, and his grand old mother, madame la marquise—and a pretty time I should have had of it, when the Revolution came. If I had got back to my own country at all, it would have been without my head, or, at least, with one fastened on with a broad black velvet ribbon, like the woman sitting under the guillotine, in the horrid German book you are so fond of reading. As it was, he only tore his hair, and gave me this beautiful fan when he left me; and how much better that was, for he soon got over it." "It don't hurt a man half so much as you young girls think, to be refused," she continued, taking up a queerly folded billet-doux, which commenced with "Most respected and admirable Miss Sally," and looked as though Sir Charles Grandison had written it for Miss Harriet Byron. "Now this note—it's very prettily worded—I don't think young men know how to write notes to young women nowadays, they are so free and familiar; well, this note—it was from a Maryland planter, one of the Calverts, a gentleman indeed; you never see such young men now, so courtly and dignified; he never met me without bowing over my hand. He was the first man I ever refused; and do you know I was simple enough to cry all night about it? Of course I couldn't have him, for your grandfather, you know, was a Puritan, a Winslow, and would never hear of a daughter of his marrying a follower of 'the Scarlet Woman;' but I thought he would never get over it; he said he never would, and next month he was engaged to his cousin! I knew better, after that, what men meant by saying 'they'd never get over it.'" Here my aunt Sally unrolled a piece of silver paper, and drew from it a lock of beautiful chestnut hair. I knew its gloss directly; it was her own. She rolled it over her finger, and half sighed as she went on: "It's one thing to make a man fall in love with you, and another thing to keep him so. Any moderately pretty girl who has common sense can do the first, and many an ugly one too, if she has any kind of understanding of things; but most girls stop there, and let their lovers get into an everyday, matter-of-course way of loving. That's foolish: if a man isn't more in love with you at the end of the year than he was at the beginning, depend upon it you've made some mistake. It all depends on your not being too anxious about the matter yourself, for then you can be grave or gay, kind or cold, as you see best. I wonder what has become of the poor fellow who had this lock of hair! I let him keep it for a week. I suppose I ought not to have given it to him; but, dear me, I was always too good-natured, and it was the fashion just then to wear short curls. He came from the frontier—came in with the Continentals—such a noble-looking fellow, and so devoted—with such stories of forest life. I suppose he dreamed of taking me back to his cabin. It was well enough for him to dream, but we should have made each other very unhappy; so I took back my lock of hair, and he went to Ohio."

While my aunt Sally was, half sadly, calling to mind the young hunter and soldier of the Revolution, I had taken a silk bag from the back of the drawer, and was drawing from it a package of letters. She took them from my hand, and, as she put them back, looked me in the face; her lips quivered, and tears filled her fine eyes as she said—"After all, my dear niece, to a true woman's heart the happiness of loving is far greater than the vain pleasure of being loved."

A CHAPTER ON PIGMENTS, PATCHES, MASKS, ETC

BY MRS. WHITE.

WE have reserved for the subject of this paper those artificial helps to beauty, to the use of which feminine vanity, and that still stronger feeling (to which it is the handmaid)—the wish to appear attractive in the eyes of man—have at all periods, and in all parts of the world, led. Unlike other superfluities, the offsprings of luxury and refinement, we find the aborigines of America and the Cape as fond of enhancing, after their fashion, their charms with charcoal and red earth, as French ladies of the last century were lavish of pearl-powder and rouge. The intention is the same, however the pigments of the artists may vary. Nor is the universality of the practice more curious than its antiquity. The prophet Jeremiah speaks of rending the eyes with paint; and the toilet of Jezebel, mentioned in the Second Book of Kings, differs little from that of a modern actress, who paints her face, and brightens and enlarges the appearance of her eyes, by an application nearly similar, except that the material is Indian ink, instead of the powder of lead or antimony, which ladies in the East still use for this purpose.

The semi-pagan writer Tertullian, attributes the discovery of rouge, and the black powder for the eyelashes, to the researches of the fallen angels, who out of their knowledge of the hidden things of earth, and their love for the daughters of men, drew from the inmost recesses of nature whatever could add to or embellish the beauty of their mortal favorites—an idea which gives an antediluvian antiquity to this part of our theme, and subjects the daughters-in-law of Noah to the imputation of bringing back to earth the meretricious arts of their forebearers. At any rate, the books of the Old Testament, to which we have alluded, prove that at a very primary period of written history women (if not men, which some authors incline to think) aided their complexions with fucus; and, like the Arabian dames of whom Russel speaks (Moore, by the way, has quoted him in verse)—

To give that long, dark languish to the eye.”

A practice which, from the proofs furnished us in the Egyptian gallery of the British Museum, appears to have been as popular with the beauties of Thebes and Memphis as with the stately daughters of the Twelve Tribes.

Shaw, in his travels, tells us that the mode of using the lead ore amongst Eastern ladies, is by dipping a wooden bodkin about the roundness of a quill into the powder, and drawing it afterwards between the eyelashes over the ball of the eye—a process well expressed in the prophet’s phrase, “rending the eyes;” for this appears to be the ancient manner of using it, some of the vases and bottles which have contained them, as the Egyptians called the metallic color for the eyelids, having with them the pins, or styles, for laying on the pigment.

It was most probably from this people that those of ancient Greece and Rome borrowed their love of unguents and cosmetics, as well as their use of false hair and metal mirrors, and all the other artificial aids that luxury afterwards brought into vogue, as we find them on the buried toilets of Pompeii and Herculaneum, and which were as ordinary when Ovid wrote, as two hundred years after when Lucian described them.

From the Roman poet we learn that hair-dye was as much in demand in the city of the seven hills as in any modern metropolis we might mention; and that towers of false hair were worn by those to whom nature had been niggardly in this adornment, as well as false teeth, false eyebrows and eyelashes, and that pomatum, rouge, and white point were in constant requisition. This latter “Pharian varnish,” by the way, was procured from the entrails of crocodiles (numbers of which infested the island of Pharos, at the mouth of the Nile, from which its name was derived), and is said to have been excellent for taking off freckles and spots in the face, and for whitening the skin; but various herbal preparations were used for the same purpose.

Like the ancient Britons, who perhaps derived the taste from their conquerors, the Romans were great admirers of sunny or bright hair, the flava coma, which color they gave it artificially, as did the old inhabitants of our island, whose naturally fair locks were rendered brighter by the aid of a cosmetic.

Even in comparatively modern times, we find this admiration of golden hair existing; but the poetry of the phrase cannot conceal that the hue occasionally degenerated into the objectionable color, which Hentsner, with good hearty truthfulness, tells us Queen Elizabeth affected at sixty-seven. “She wore false red hair!” a fashion which doubtless other ladies of the time were fain to follow. At one period we read that fashion became so fanciful upon the matter, that the fair votaries who followed her wore their hair of different colors, alternated according to taste.

According to the chronologists, fans, muffs, masks, and false hair, made their appearance in England almost simultaneously in 1572, having been imported from France, where they had found their way from Italy, under very questionable auspices. If this be correct, we may regard the "virgin queen" as the original patroness of the "invisible perukes," and "real heads of hair," which have never since fallen into desuetude, and according to the statements of their manufacturers, have just now attained to a perfection which in their modest phrase surpasses Nature herself. Powdering the hair is a comparatively recent innovation, and is said to have taken its rise from some of the ballad-singers at the fair of St. Germain, whitening their heads to make them look ridiculous.* By what means it found its way from the fair-field to the court we know not; but that which began in buffoonery has since been made an appointment of the gravest offices, and though no longer tolerated by fashion, maintains its dignity as an appendage of the bishop's throne and the bar.

Twiss, who wrote his travels through Spain in 1773, remarks that the Macaroni ladies in Cadiz wore yellow powder in their hair, which to him was nauseous and disgusting. But he observes, with evident surprise at the omission, that though the habits of both sexes are entirely in the French fashion, they use neither paint nor patches. These last coquettish adjuncts, which in all probability first covered a blemish on the cheek or brow of beauty, appear to have come into request about the year 1672, when a book was published, entitled "New Instructions unto Youth for their Behavior, and also A Discourse against Powdering of Hair, Naked Breasts, Black Spots, and other unseemly customs." However Herbé, in his costumes, remarks that, in 1690, "Les dames conservaient l'usage du fard, des mouches, et des masques." And Addison tells us that the French baby for 1712, exhibited by the milliners at the Seven Stars in King Street, Covent-Garden, and habited after the manner of the most eminent toasts in Paris, wore a small patch on her breast; and as we see in Hogarth's pictures, and the pages of the Spectator, even gentlemen resorted to the pretty affectation of wearing them. Sometimes they were placed upon the hand, to draw attention to its shape or whiteness; at others they served as notes of admiration to a dimple, or contrasted with the clear bright color of the cheek. At the court of Queen Anne, the fashion of wearing them appears to have reached its culminating point, but they lingered in the outskirts of fashion till within the child memory of our mothers.

Strutt tells us that the first mention he has found of the painting of the face in England, is in a very old manuscript of the fourteenth century, preserved in the Harleian library; but it would appear that the exquisites of the opposite sex resorted to this effeminacy also; and during the regency of Katharine de Medici rouge was commonly worn by the gallants of the court. Even Henry the Third of France, at one time famous for his valor, fell into this unmanly delicacy; and while conspiracies were forming about him, felt only anxious to improve his complexion, for which purpose he covered his face at night with a cloth dipped in essences, though he painted over its effect in the day.

The editor of the "Court and Times of James the First," informs us that during this dissolute reign all the court ladies painted so exactly alike, that, with their hair frizzled and powdered, they could not be told one from another: and observes of the Countess of Bedford, who had returned to court (though in her sickness she in a manner vowed never to return there): "Marry, she is somewhat reformed in her attire, and forbears painting, which they say makes her look somewhat strangely among so many wizards, which, together with their frizzled, powdered hair, make them look all alike, so that you can scarcely know one from another at the first view."

Philtres were commonly sold by medical empirics in this reign (as they had been long before), for the improvement or restoration of beauty; and the old herbalists, from Dr. Turner downwards, abound with floral specifics for the purpose.

Cowslips, gathered with the dew on them, and made into an ointment, or used as a wash, were said to be of great effect, and not only restored beauty when lost, but took away wrinkles! White roses were also deemed effective as beautifiers; and lady lilies, which, as well as the young leaves and tendrils of the vine, are said to have been made use of by the Roman beauties in their baths.

The bath, by the way, has always been an indispensable adjunct of the toilet; but in an old MS. book of Prognostics, of the time of Richard II., ladies are advised, that "in the months of March and November they should not goe to the bathe for beautye." In the mean while, however, here is a recipe "to make a fayr face," by "putting together the milk of an ass and a black kow, poured on brimstone, of each a like quantity; then anoynte thy face, so thou shalt be fayr and white." Asses' milk appears to have been from a very early period considered of great effect as a cosmetic. Poppæa, the wife of Nero, who is said to have been the most delicate woman with regard to her person, kept for the supply of her bath a train of five hundred milch asses in constant attendance. It was this fastidious lady who first introduced the use of the mask (which had hitherto only been used for theatrical purposes), as a preservative of the complexion—a fashion which, like most Roman ones, probably had its type in the East; the Arabian women, according to Carrel, wearing black masks, with little clasps prettily ordered; a fashion that, judging from the tenacity with which Eastern nations cling to antique

Such were the masks that in this country, during the sixteenth, and till the commencement of the seventeenth century, it was the fashion for ladies to wear whenever they walked or rode abroad, or went to the play, or other public place of amusement—a fashion in the high tide of which the fair wearers were famed neither for their prudery nor prudence.

There must have been something amazingly piquant in the appearance of these silken visors, which in general covered only a part of the face, revealing a portion of the forehead, and reaching down to the bottom of the nose, so that the mouth and chin might be seen. This article appears to us to have been more coquettish than useful; it was not the true Poppæan instrument which the old Roman ladies wore over their faces in hot weather, to keep off the sun and wind, but a mischievous pretence, discovering more than it concealed, and enhancing by its pretty mystery the effect of whatever beauty lurked in red lips and rounded chin, or revealed itself in the brow.

In Shakespeare's time, this was not the only species in use; Autolycus, in the "Winter's Tale," in the list of his wares, sings of a distinction which would lead us to suppose that the whole mask and the demi-visor were then equally in vogue.

"Masks for shoes, and for noses;"

In the reign of Charles I., this appendage was universally worn; and from the queen herself to the smallest marchande de modes, no aspirant to fashion appeared in public without it. Everywhere the mask—on the mall, in the mulberry gardens* (the only place, as Evelyn tells us, for ladies of quality and their gallants to be exceedingly well cheated), at the play, the park, and the puppet show (for the Marionettes were even then in fashion)—everywhere the mask.

How curious a cavalcade does the following paragraph, a bit of court news in the days of the "nimble, quick, black-eyed, brown-haired," Henrietta Maria, as Dr. Mead calls the little French Queen of Charles I., how curious a cavalcade does it raise up in the imagination! "On Tuesday, the queen went by water to Blackwall, and then dined aboard the Earl of Warwick's fair ship called the Neptune; went thence by water to Greenwich; thence came on horseback to and through London; the Earl attending her Majesty to Somerset House, forty or fifty riding before bareheaded, save her four priests with black caps—herself and ladies in little black beaver hats, and masked, but her Majesty had a fair white feather in her hat!" This was in 1626; but in 1712, and even later, the mask had not wholly disappeared.

Except in pictures, no remnant of this antique appendage to dress appears to have been discovered amongst the unburied homes of Pompeii and Herculaneum; its materials were too perishable; and while the cosmetics (which according to the belief of the fair artificers) assisted the beauty of the face it protected—the perfumed unguents, rouge, and other toilet furniture, survive—the mask itself has mouldered.

To us the few steps (if any) that modern art has taken in advance of the ancients in these particulars, is one of the fairest signs of actual refinement and civilization. After more than 1800 years, we find the dressing-room of a lady of ancient Magna Græcia, as rich in all the artificial necessities of the toilet as any Macaroni beauty's of the present time. The essence bottles, the vases of perfumes and oils, the pots for rouge and other paints, and vessels for collyriums of various kind, speak loudly for the Delcroixes and Atkinsons of that remote period, and prove that woman's vanity was at any rate as active a principle in the sex then as now.

Lucian, who lived in the reign of Trajan, has left his evidence, that the lava-sealed fate of these luxurious ladies by no means blunted the taste for endeavoring to improve natural beauty by art, but describes the dressing-room of a Grecian lady of his period as furnished with all the adjuncts of a modern beauty's toilet, all the cosmetic array of powder, figments, lotions, &c. &c.† But we must not forget that most important appendage of the toilet, ancient and modern, and which at one period was absolutely a part of dress—the mirror.

Like the old Egyptians, both the Greeks and Romans made them of metal—small, and usually circular, with sometimes fancifully-shaped and elegantly-ornamented handles; a bronze one from Memphis, in the British Museum, has a handle in the shape of a lotus-sceptre, with the head of Athor, the Goddess of Beauty; and another equally appropriate, is formed in the shape of a tress of hair, with two hawks. Amongst the "Greek and Roman antiquities" in the same collection, we find one, the handle of which is formed by a Venus holding a dove!

Sometimes they were made of silver; and in a lane leading from the house of Sallust, in Pompeii, in which the skeleton of a lady, with those of three (supposed) attendants, were discovered, a silver mirror, such as the Roman and Grecian ladies always carried about them, was found near her.

Women in the East, we read, are never without them; and Shaw tells us, that in Barbary a lookingglass is so favorite an appendage, that the feminine part of the inhabitants hang them at their breasts, and will not go without them, even when, after the drudgery of the day, they are obliged to go two or three miles with a pitcher or a goatskin to fetch water.

* The mulberry gardens occupied the present site of Buckingham Palace.

† Amongst the glass vessels found at Pompeii was one containing rouge similar to that worn at present.—Mrs. Starke.

In other parts of Asia the ladies wear little mirrors on their thumbs; and those of the Harem not unusually have them set in the centre of their feather fans. In Spain, and anciently in England also, they might occasionally be seen flashing on the panache, or exterior ray of this instrument when folded.

In the days of Henry VIII., when the palace mirrors at Hampton Court were, as Strutt tells us, of steel, looking-glasses being very few, and very small, were then only used by ladies who kept them in cases, and being for the most part portable, carried them in their pockets, or locked them up with other trinkets; so that even in this particular the analogy between the customs of the toilet in classic regions and times, and in the semi-barbaric ones of our own country, is more complete than on a cursory glance one would imagine.

Patches no longer point the eye to a dimple, nor masks affect modesty while provoking inquisitiveness; and though hair-dye and rouge, pearl powder and lotions, still figure on the catalogues of the perfumers, bearing evidence that somewhere they are in demand, few of the consumers but have the grace to keep their obligations to such aids as quiet as possible—a very decided proof, that as refinement progresses we grow ashamed of such empiricism, and that woman is daily learning to trust to higher charms than mere physical beauty to make her a helpmate for man.

ILLUSTRIOUS WOMEN OF OUR TIME.

"It appears to be a law of our nature, that recreation and amusement are as necessary to the mind as exercise is to the body."—CHAMBERS.

MARY HOWITT.

THERE are some things," says a periodical critic, "which women do better than men; and of these, perhaps, novel-writing is one. Naturally endowed with greater delicacy of taste and feeling, with a moral sense not blunted and debased by those contaminations to which men are exposed, leading lives rather of observation than of action; with leisure to attend to the minutiae of conduct, and more subtle developments of character, they are peculiarly qualified for the task of exhibiting faithfully and pleasingly the various phases of domestic life, and those varieties which checker the surface of society. Women are less stilted in their style; they are more content to describe naturally what they have observed, without attempting the introduction of those extraneous ornaments which are sometimes sought at the expense of truth. They are less ambitious, and are, therefore, more just; they are far more exempt from that prevailing literary vice of the present day, exaggeration, and have not taken their stand among the feverish followers of what may be called the intense style of writing: a style much praised by those who inquire only if a work is calculated to make a strong impression, and omit entirely the more important question, whether that impression be founded on truth or on delusion.

To the dreamy rhapsodies and heated exhibition of stormy passions in which such writers indulge, Mary Howitt's works of fiction offer a very striking contrast; their perfectly truthful spirit finds a way at once to the heart, and succeeds in engaging our interest and in making us in love with human nature in situations and under circumstances rarely penetrated so successfully by the light of imagination, and consequently the character, incident, dialogue have made her tales as popular as they are instructive.

As a writer for the young, Mary Howitt has been long eminently successful, and it is no mean subject of congratulation to us to know that she is decidedly not of the class of individuals who have taken to write children's books simply because they found themselves incapable of writing any other, and who yet consider their childish books, which require no mind at all, to be of the same importance as children's books, which exercise powers of mind of no common class. To distinguish the difference between the two classes, and to find the eminent success of the latter in their combined object of instruction and amusement, we need go no further than to the juvenile readers themselves. With them, books written by those possessed of a great share of natural talent are invariably found to be most popular; and as an evidence of this truth we may remark that we have frequently been struck, when in the nursery, at seeing the well-thumbed tales and poems of Mary Howitt, and the delight with which its occupants dwelt upon and committed to memory the stores provided for their entertainment, even when they reached to the length of Madam Fortescue and her cat, that captivating tale of domestic treachery and sorrow. We cannot but feel assured that such poems for children come from a heart overflowing with love and interest for them and for their pursuits, and that she truly and sincerely utters her pretty lines—

Blessings on them! they in me
Move a kind of sympathy,
With their wishes, hopes, and fears,
With their laughter and their tears—
With their wonder so intense,
And their small experience!"

To a mind like hers the success of her laudable efforts for the young must be the best reward: still, others remain in store, and amongst them the gratitude of parents, and of all lovers and instructors of youth. The "Quarterly Review" offers on this point some clever remarks, from which we extract the following passage for the benefit of our readers, and because it so well coincides with our own opinions on a subject of such importance as the early culture of the human mind.

"Juvenile books are as necessary to children as juvenile companionship, though nothing can be worse than for them to be restricted exclusively to either. Doubtless, the imaginary exemption from the rules and ceremonials of general literature which little books as well as little folks enjoy, has fostered a host of works, from the simply unprofitable to the directly pernicious, which would otherwise not have seen the light. But neither this nor any other consideration should forbid the cultivation of a branch of literature which, properly understood, gives exercise to the highest powers, both of head and heart, or make us ungrateful to those writers by whom great powers have been so devoted. For children are not their only debtors; nor is the delight with which we take up one of the companions of our childhood entirely attributable to associations of days gone by, nor the assiduity with which we devour a new-comer solely ascribable to parental watchfulness; but it is with these as with some game which we join at first merely to try whether we can play as we once did, or with the view of keeping our little playmates out of mischief, but which we end by liking for its own sake, though we do not always say so.

We are happy to know that many of the exquisitely expressed emotions of parental tenderness which pervade the writings of Mary Howitt are drawn from her own domestic life, and that, in devoting her time and talents to the benefit of children, she has the blessing of being enabled to call some of these home treasures her own. One of her most attractive tales, "The Children's Year," was, in fact, written from closely observing and noting during a whole year the words and actions of two of her children, a boy and a girl, severally aged seven and five years and a half. A companion to this volume, "Our Cousins in Ohio," sets forth the doings of two English children, and is an artless journal of the duties and enjoyments attending a recently emigrated family; and this, with other works, is embellished with illustrations on steel, by Anna Mary Howitt, the talented daughter of talented parents.

Mary Howitt has always been distinguished for her happy imitation of the ancient ballad compositions; and their simplicity, earnestness, fancy, and womanly tenderness, have given them a permanent place in the poetry of England. "It is," as she remarks in the preface to her ballads and other poems, "perhaps, needless to say that I have been all my life a passionate admirer of ballad poetry. Brought up as a child in a picturesque, old-fashioned part of England, remote from books and from the world, and under circumstances of almost conventional seclusion, the echoes of this old traditional literature found their way to my ear and my heart. Few books, except those of a religious and somewhat mystical character, reached me; but an old domestic, with every requisite for a German Märchen Frau, who had a memory stored with ballads, old songs, and legends, inflamed my youthful imagination by her wild chants and recitations, and caused it to take very early flights into the regions of romance. When I married, under circumstances the most favorable for a young poetical spirit, the world of literature was at once opened before me; and, to mark the still prevailing character of my taste, I may say that the first book I read when I had my free choice in a large library, was 'Percy's Relics of Ancient Poetry,' of which I had heard, but till then had never seen. The first fifteen years of my life were devoted to poetry. My husband and I published two joint volumes of poems within the first few years of our marriage, and then, giving freer vent to my own peculiar fancies, I again took to writing ballads, which were published in various periodicals of the day; and the favorable reception they met with gave me the utmost encouragement. The happiest period of my life, however, was, when gladdened by the praise of the public, and encouraged by my husband, on whose taste and judgment I had the greatest dependence, I resolved to put forth my whole strength into one effort, which should afford me free scope for working out character, and for dramatic effect, at which I had always aimed, even in the simplest ballad. My hopes were high, and I thought to achieve a name among the poets of my country. I accordingly wrote 'Seven Temptations,' a poem faulty in many respects, and different to what I would now do, but with which at that time I spared no pains. Authors will, therefore, understand my feelings, when I say that the first review I read of this work was so unfavorable, and that without giving a single quotation in proof of its opinion, that I was cut to the heart. I never experienced a sensation like that before, and I pray that I never may again. The book, however, had its share of praise, and made me many dear and valuable friends. But from that day I tremble at the name of critic, and feel a peculiar sensation of heart when public judgment is about to be passed upon me. I have somewhat of this feeling at this moment, because, although the critics have praised my ballads, and many of them have called upon me to give them to the public in a collected form, still, I myself am not precisely the same person that I was ten or fifteen years ago, when the greater number were written. Life teaches many lessons in that time; the tastes and the feelings become matured, or perhaps greatly changed; and I also now require in poetry, to say nothing of its subject, a degree of polish and finish which, in my younger years, I cared little about. My next volume of poetry must be different in many respects from anything which I have yet done, though it must still retain that love of Christ, of the poor, and of little children, which always was and will be a ruling sentiment of my soul."

Undeterred by the unwarranted rebuff which this unscrupulous criticism gave to the production of Mary Howitt's poetical genius, she persevered in her intellectual efforts, and numerous have been the works of amusement and utility, both in poetry and prose, which have been thus added to our literary stores. To her knowledge of the German, Danish, and Swedish languages, we owe the acquisition of many "pearls of price," amongst them the Improvisatore of Hans Andersen. We are told that the modern Danish and Swedish are so much like English that some sentences of those languages, as uttered by a Dane or Swede, would be intelligible to an Englishman who might not have learnt them; but no language so closely resembles another, either in vocabulary or in construction, as not to require considerable skill and judgment in rendering the sense as the author intended it should be taken, without any appearance of constraint, any leaning to that patchwork style arising out of the use of words unfamiliar in their own language, which force on the mind the fact that it is a translation we are reading. Such skill and such judgment are shown in all Mary Howitt's translations. They speak no "broken English." We feel that we are introduced to the real thoughts and sentiments of the writers as they themselves would have spoken them. We read the English book as an original, and thus pay the highest compliment to its translator.

This diffusion of foreign literature by means of English translations, which are daily increasing in number, has had the effect eloquently attributed by Canning to steam power, that of "creeping unexpected neighborhoods, and new combinations, of social relation. Foreign languages are no longer a bar to our knowledge of foreign works. The patience of the translator, like the magician's spell, flings wide the pages hitherto sealed from our eyes; interpreters have risen up between us and our fellow-workmen in the world's great Tower of Babel." And to none of them do we owe a larger debt of gratitude than to Mary Howitt, for her interpretation of works composed in the language in which Hamlet spoke and thought, "that melancholy Prince of Denmark, whose doubtful existence Shakspeare's glorious dream has taught us to look upon as a familiar reality." The study of this language has probably inspired a work, in which the literature and romance of Northern Europe are most ably treated and described. It is the joint production of Mr. and Mrs. Howitt; has just appeared; and we can confidently recommend it to the notice of our readers as one in which they will not fail to find the profit, interest, and amusement which may always be gathered from works bearing the name of Howitt.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S DREAM.

BY WILLIAM E. SCREVEN, ESQ., AUTHOR OF "CHRISTIANITY, AND ITS RELATIONS TO POETRY AND PHILOSOPHY."

How often is history read in a superficial and faithless spirit. The mere facts are marked upon the memory, as though written with a pen on senseless paper. The significant soul of the solemn and eventful Past enters not into the heart which has been deadened by the sceptical maxims of the Present.

Let us, in considering the touching episode of Nebuchadnezzar's Dream, escape for a brief space from the modern atmosphere of mockery and unbelief; that unbelief of the heart which often prevents us from realizing the impressive events of the miraculous epoch, even when we have given our intellectual assent to the certainty of their past occurrence.

And first let us remember, as a matter of indubitable truth, that there was once a miraculous epoch in the history of our world; a time when God did veritably make himself manifest by signs and wonders, by dreams and miracles. It was an awful period; for how can imperfect man endure, without horror-struck emotions, a direct communication from his almighty and eternal Creator! That wonderful dispensation has passed away: we live under one of mercy and compassion, in which God, "remembering that we are dust, and pitying our infirmities," has veiled himself in the flesh, manifesting himself to us only through our gracious Mediator. But let us not forget, in the clearness and peace of this "later day," that there was once, in very truth, a miraculous and chaotic stage in the history of mankind, and let us receive the fragmentary relics of that portentous time with childlike simplicity of faith. Let us listen to the "low sad music of humanity" which comes to us so solemnly out of the night of remote ages, and "be not faithless, but believing."

Nebuchadnezzar, king of Assyria, by his valor and enlarged policy, had extended the already vast kingdom inherited from his illustrious ancestors, into an empire whose boundless extent, in the expressive language of Scripture, embraced "all nations and all tongues." Among the latest of his conquests he had subdued Jerusalem, the Holy City; being the unconscious instrument, in the hands of God, of the fulfilment of the prophecy, made by the inspired Jeremiah, of the seventy years' captivity of the Jews. The king's heart had become enlarged: he viewed the wide extent of his empire; the effulgent glory of Babylon, his splendid capital, and the recent reduction of Jerusalem, the far-famed city of the Unknown God, with boundless pride. He had ordered that certain of the ill-fated children of Israel should be reared to become his astrologers and wise men, and the order of the king in those wild days was as the voice of fate. Among others of God's chosen people, Daniel, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego were selected for this purpose, from the tribe of Judah.

A dream which had visited the king, and which Daniel alone of all the wise men could interpret, had set him up as second in Assyria only to the king himself. The wondrous miracle of the fiery furnace had established Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego at the head of the provinces. But, unhappily for Nebuchadnezzar, while acknowledging the inspired wisdom of Daniel, and convinced that his Jewish companions had been rescued from the fiery furnace only by the hand of the God of Israel, his heart was not subdued to the sovereign authority of the Supreme and Holy One. He still regarded himself, with oriental arrogance, as the King of kings and the Lord of lords. If he had recognized the supremacy of God, it was only in a moment of panic and awe: as soon as these transient emotions ceased, his heart was surrendered to its customary atmosphere of adulation and self-glory.

Nebuchadnezzar was not an ordinary man, and still less an ordinary prince. The selection of "certain of the children of Israel," "understanding science," to become his advisers; the unvarying favor with which he regarded Daniel, even when telling the most unpleasant truths, and the instant readiness of his acknowledgment of God's almighty hand in the miracle of the furnace, exhibit a sagacity and loftiness of mind altogether remarkable in the annals of paganism. Heaven had marked him out to be at once a monument of its miraculous power and boundless grace. He was about to pass through an ordeal, strange and wild beyond description, but of which he had not previously the faintest conception.

The king "saw a dream which made him afraid, and troubled him." He beheld, in the visions of the night, a tree, which was flourishing, and very luxuriant. While he gazed, "a watcher from heaven" descended, and commanded that it should be hewn down. Nevertheless, the stump, and the vital roots, should be left, to the intent that, when "seven times" had passed over it, it should again grow and be strong.

The Chaldeans and magicians being called in, failed to interpret the dream. Finally, Daniel was consulted, who, being "astonished for one hour" by the overwhelming destiny of the unhappy monarch, declared that his empire should be taken from him, and that he should become as a beast of the field for seven years: that at the end of the appointed time his understanding and his sceptre should be restored to him, and he should then know that the God of Israel is the creator of man, and the ruler of kings.

Nebuchadnezzar was oppressed by strange and solemn thoughts. For many days, even in the midst of his splendid court, surrounded by all the pomp and adulation of that barbaric age, his visage wore a subdued and troubled expression. But, week after week, month after month, rolled away, and he still sat, undisturbed, on the magnificent throne of Babylon, worshipped as an idol, almost as a god, while nothing as yet indicated the fulfilment of Daniel's appalling prophecy.

As time thus passed, the king's heart waxed stronger and stronger, until, in the stoutness of his self-content, he felt that his empire was immovable, and that he was independent even of heaven itself.

"At the end of twelve months he walked in the palace of the kingdom of Babylon. The king spake and said, Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power, and for the honor of my majesty?"

"While the word was in the king's mouth, there fell a voice from heaven, saying, O King Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken; the kingdom is departed from thee."

The king had risen from his couch fresh and radiant in the glory of his beauty and his might. It was as he passed, in the brightness of early morn, to his council-chamber, where his lords awaited him, that he had uttered the impious boast which called down the long-threatened vengeance of heaven. A change, loathsome and frightful beyond conception, came over the mighty monarch: his countenance ceased to be human: ferocity, mingled with vacant imbecility, usurped the place of intelligence: he fell prone upon his hands, and grovelled at the feet of his attendants. The counsellors assembled in an adjoining apartment were instantly summoned, and, crowding into the gallery, surrounded in speechless amazement the abject and shocking figure of the once regal Nebuchadnezzar. The recollection of the hitherto despised but now fulfilled prophecy of Daniel rushed across their minds, and their anointed king was borne away by their own hands to the gates of the city, and thrust forth to herd with the beasts of the field.

At the time of Nebuchadnezzar's debasement, Daniel occupied a position in the Assyrian government, as was before remarked, second only to that of royalty. To this post he had been raised by the king's edict, in consequence of his unerring interpretation of the monarch's frequent dreams, and doubtless also on account of the stern and unbending integrity of his character. His companions, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, it will be remembered, were at the same time filling the highest posts in the provincial departments. It was doubtless owing to this remarkable condition of the Assyrian government that Nebuchadnezzar's kingdom was preserved to him until his restoration to reason; otherwise, it were impossible to explain so singular a fact, when the cruel and unscrupulous ambition of those barbarous days is considered. The inference, however, is easy from the simple recital of facts in the Sacred Volume, that Daniel, from his supreme authority in the absence of the king, was enabled to preserve his empire for him in all its integrity during the awful interregnum. In this he was assisted by his Hebrew brethren, who, together with himself, were induced to make every necessary effort to that end, from their firm conviction, that the entire prophecy would be fulfilled, and the king restored, eventually, both to his reason and his empire. They therefore administered the Assyrian government, for seven years, with that wisdom and unblemished virtue for which they had become so renowned throughout the entire realm.

For years, the once princely Nebuchadnezzar had herded with the beasts of the field. With them he came forth at early dawn to the fat meadows of the Euphrates: with them he grazed the luxuriant grass, and with them retired to the fold at "dewy eve," or sought repose under the shelter of some neighboring copse. The change which had passed over him so suddenly in his palace had gradually increased: his entire aspect was transformed. His hair had grown like "eagles' feathers," and his nails like "birds' claws;" intelligence had retrograded into instinct, and as he grovelled in the muddy pools, or cropped the green herbage, there was no thought but for the present want, or the present enjoyment. His face had assumed the dull and staring fixedness of the "beast that perishes," and, even as he moved, the position of man was exchanged for that of the quadruped.

Behold him, as he feeds with the oxen, among the sedges, by the river's brink. The intense stillness of noon has hushed every sound, except the rippling of the sluggish stream, and the distinct cropping of the grass, at regular intervals, by the herd at their mid-day meal. A loud plash of the water breaks the silence. Some large fish has risen to the surface, and exultingly returned to his native depths, after waking the echoes for many a rood. The herd raise their heads in listening wonder: the cropping of the grass has given way to mute expectation. Among the dumb and intent faces, behold the once majestic countenance of Nebuchadnezzar, lifted above the sedges, full of vacant surprise and apprehension. His matted hair falls like a mass of coarse feathers over his broad and naked shoulders; his eyes gleam with intense fire, yet are inexpressive of the least spark of human intelligence, while his mouth closes upon the unchewed herbage just browsed from the meadow. Instinct suggests that there is nothing to fear, and he and his brute companions move leisurely on, as they feed through their accustomed range.

Strange, wonderful spectacle! but as true and certain once, as that God liveth always.

"Seven times" had passed over him: God had completed his terrible but gracious work: the king's heart was subdued: pride had taken its everlasting flight: meekness and love were enshrined forever in all its high places.

"And at the end of the days, I, Nebuchadnezzar, lifted up mine eyes unto Heaven, and mine understanding returned unto me, and I blessed the Most High, and I praised and honored Him that liveth forever, whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, and His kingdom is from generation to generation:

"And all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing: and he doeth according to His will in the army of Heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay His hand, or say unto Him, What doest Thou?

"At the same time my reason returned unto me: and for the glory of my kingdom, mine honor and brightness returned unto me; and my counsellors and my lords sought unto me: and I was established in my kingdom, and excellent majesty was added unto me.

"Now, I, Nebuchadnezzar, praise, and extol, and honor the King of Heaven, all whose works are truth, and His ways judgment; and those that walk in pride He is able to abase."

MY SISTER.

BY G. L. PARSONS.

In the springtime of her being,
When her laugh was free and light,
Was she called to leave this prison,
And to wing her upward flight—
When her heart knew naught of sorrow,
And her soul was free from sin,
Was she in her beauty gathered Underneath Jehovah's wing.

Off I think I see her standing,
Clad in robes of spotless white,
And a band of angels round her,
With their crowns of glory bright
Now I think I hear them singing—
Singing songs of joy above—
Ever round that happy throne
Of our Saviour's endless love.

COSTUMES OF ALL NATIONS.—THIRD SERIES.

CHAPTER XI.

THE TOILET IN PALESTINE AND SYRIA.

IN Dr. Clarke's "Manners and Customs of the Ancient Israelites," he says, that "the shape of their dress cannot be exactly known. There is every reason to suppose that it was similar to that of the ancient Egyptians, which consisted of a tunic, a palium or cloak, and a girdle." All ancient nations seem to have had the same costume, formed of long garments, without much shape or ornament; and, as these were all much alike, they descended from father to son for many generations. The colors most valued among the ancients appear to have been purple, red, and violet; but white was the most used by the Israelites. Young people wore variegated clothes, like the coat of Joseph (Gen. xxxvii. 23). "And it came to pass, when Joseph was come unto his brethren, that they stript Joseph of his coat, his coat of many colors, that was on him."

Their garments, however, were richly ornamented with fringes, borders of color or embroidery, and jewels; and they were ordered to put borders on their robes, to remind them continually of the law of God. On their heads they wore a sort of tiara, like that of the Persians; for, among this people, to be bare-headed was a sign of mourning. Their hair was long, for shaving the head marked sorrow and affliction.

In the Scriptures, in various parts, we find descriptions of the manner in which the Jewish women attired themselves. We read in Ezekiel of the fine stuffs of different colors, a silken girdle, purple shoes, bracelets, a necklace, ear-rings, and a crown or mitre; and in Isaiah iii. 18, &c., we have a long account of their costume in all its varieties, when the prophet reproaches the daughters of Sion for their vanity and corruption; and truly, at that time, the love of dress and ornament must have been very prevalent, as we find by the numerous accessories to their toilet enumerated by the prophet.

The dress of the Jewish women was splendid with gold and embroidery. The Queen of Judea was arrayed in a garment of wrought gold. "Thus," observes Fuller, "such gallantry was fashionable amongst the Jews long before any thereof was used in the western parts, or Rome itself; indeed, a mantle of cloth of gold we find mentioned by Pliny as a great novelty, though such a one had been worn by the Jewish queens a thousand years before."

Their trowsers and tunics were made of fine linen, and rich silks embroidered in gold and jewels; they wore also a veil, which fell over the whole person down to the feet. The anklets of gold or silver, often alluded to in Scripture, were very heavy, and made a ringing sound as the wearer walked. The pride and pleasure that the Jewish ladies took in making a tinkling with these ornaments are severely reproved by the prophet Isaiah. It is supposed that the caul alluded to by the prophet was intended to describe the peculiar manner of dressing the hair. It was at that time divided into tresses plaited with silk threads, gold ornaments, and golden coins.

Besides the anklets, the Jewish women wore ear-rings, nose-jewels, chains of silver and gold, and bracelets. The ear-rings probably contained a verse from the Scriptures, to serve as an amulet or charm, in which most Orientals place much faith, as they believe these amulets have power to avert evils and obtain blessings. They also wore from the waist boxes or bottles containing rich perfume; these they fastened to a chain and hung to their girdles. The Jewish women are still very fond of jewels and ornaments of every kind, and, wherever they dwell, are usually as much celebrated for the costliness and splendor of their dress as for their great beauty.

We must give the description of a court-dress, which is exactly according to the Jewish fashion, and is borrowed from the "Tale of Zillah," which, though a novel, abounds in interesting and faithful records of the manners, costumes, fashions, and many other details of the Holy City.

"She accordingly wore the parti-colored robe, which she had herself embroidered with flowers and gold thread, and of which the sleeves were of the richest gauze, decorated with ribbons and facings, curiously sewed together. These were blue, which, being a celestial color, was in high favor, and much used for cuffs and trimmings; though it was not deemed decorous to have the whole apparel of this hue, since none more was used about the curtains and veils of the tabernacle. Her under-garment, of fine linen, reaching to the ankles, and bordered also with blue, had been decorated by her own skilful needle with clouded colors, which bore the name of feather-work. Across her bosom was a pectoral of byssus, a sort of silk of a golden yellow, formed from the tuft that grows on a large shell-fish of the mussel species, found on the coasts of the Mediterranean, for the great men of the earth had not then begun to rob the silkworm of its covering. Her sandals were of badger-skin leather, secured with golden clasps. Her head-dress was of simple, and, according to modern notions, of not very becoming form; for her black and luxuriant locks, being drawn behind the head, were divided into several tresses, their beauty consisting in their length and thickness, and the extremity of each being adorned with pearls and jewels, or ornaments of silver and gold, of which latter metal she also wore narrow, plain cirolels around her wrists and ankles."

In a work published in 1819, called "Letters from Palestine," we read: "The female costume of Palestine is not particularly graceful. The outward robe consists of a loose gown, the skirts of which appear as if hanging from the shoulder-blades; the arms, wrists, and ankles are bound with broad metal rings, and the waist is encircled by a belt, profusely studded with some shining substance, intended, probably, to resemble precious stones. The crown of the head is covered with a compact sort of network, interwrought with plates of gold and silver, so arranged as to conceal a part only of the hair, which flows in profuse ringlets over the neck and shoulders; yet even this natural ornament is much injured by a custom very prevalent, of interweaving the extremities with silk ribbons, that descend in twisted folds to the feet. The supplemental tresses would inevitably trail on the ground, were it not for the high clogs, or rather stilts, on which women of condition are always raised when they appear in public; many of these are of an extravagant altitude, and, if the decorations of the head were of correspondent dimensions, a lady's face would seem as if fixed in the centre of her figure. The impression made on a stranger by such an equipage is certainly very ludicrous. There is, indeed, a whimsical fantasy here, almost universal in its application, which seems utterly irreconcilable with all ideas of female delicacy. Not only are the cheeks plastered with vermillion, the teeth discolored, and the eyebrows dyed, but the lips and chin are tinged with a dark indelible composition, as if the fair proprietors were ambitious of the ornament of a beard."

The katic forms the principal garment of the modern inhabitants of Palestine. It is of different sizes and degrees of fineness, usually six yards long, and five or six yards broad, serving frequently for a garment by day, and a bed and covering by night. It is very troublesome to manage, often falling upon the ground; so that the person who wears it is every moment obliged to tuck it up, and fold it anew about the body.

Jewish females in the East do not wear stockings, and generally use slippers of a red color, embroidered in gold. They are very much addicted to the use of ornaments. From the lower part of the ears they suspend large gold ear-rings, and three small ones, set with pearls, on the upper part. They load their necks with beads, and their fingers with rings: their wrists and ankles also are adorned with bracelets and anklets of solid silver, and long gold chains hang from their girdles.

"The dress of the Arabs in Syria," says Dr. Clarke, "is simple and uniform. It consists of a blue shirt, descending below the knees, the legs and feet being exposed, or the latter sometimes covered with the ancient cothurnus or buskins."

Near Jerusalem the ancient sandal is frequently met with, exactly as it is seen on Grecian statues.

"A cloak," continues Dr. Clarke, "is worn, of very coarse and heavy camel's-hair cloth, almost universally decorated with broad black and white stripes, passing vertically down the back. This is of one square piece, with holes for the arms." In this we probably behold the form and material of our Saviour's garment, for which the soldiers cast lots, being without seam, woven from the top throughout. It was the most ancient dress of the inhabitants of this country.

The women of Syria do not veil their faces so closely as those of Palestine. They wear robes with very long sleeves, hanging quite to the ground; this garment is frequently striped in gaudy colors.

The Druses, who inhabit part of Syria, wear a coarse woollen cloak, with white stripes, thrown over a waistcoat and breeches of the same stuff, tied round the waist by a sash. They cover the head with a turban, which is flat at the top, and swells out at the sides.

The women wear a coarse blue jacket and petticoat, but no stockings. Their hair is plaited, and hangs down in tails behind. They wear a singular shaped head-dress, called a tantoor. Page, in his "Travels," speaks of it as a silver cone, and says it is evidently the same as Judith's mitre. Dr. Hogg thus describes one: "In length it was, perhaps, something more than a foot, but in shape had little resemblance to a horn, being a mere hollow tube, increasing in size from the diameter of an inch and a half at one extremity to three inches at the other, where it terminated like the mouth of a trumpet." This strange ornament, placed on a cushion, is securely fixed to the upper part of the forehead by two silk cords, which, after surrounding the head, hang behind nearly to the ground, terminating in large tassels. The material of which it is made is silver, rudely embossed with flowers, stars, and other devices, and the tassels are often capped with silver. The tantoor of an unmarried female is generally made of stiff paper, or some similar material. On being married, it is the custom for the bridegroom to present his bride with one of silver, or silver tinsel. A veil is thrown over the smaller extremity of this head-dress, which descends nearly to the feet, and is drawn over the face when the wearer quits the seclusion of her home.

Tyre, once the "Queen of Nations," was formerly celebrated for the renowned purple dye, which is often mentioned by ancient writers, particularly by Homer and Virgil, who generally arrayed their heroes in vests and tunics of Tyrian purple, sometimes plain, at others ornamented. We read in the "Æneid" of

"The vests embroidered of the Tyrian dye;"

and, in another part—

"Then two fair vests, of wondrous work and cost,
Of purple woven, and with gold embossed,
For ornament the Trojan hero brought,
Which with her hand Sidonian Dido wrought."

This queen, so celebrated in olden time for being the supposed foundatress of the renowned city of Carthage, appears to have possessed the talents of her countrywomen in the use of the needle: for Virgil often alludes to her skill; and probably the scarf she presented to Æneas was the work of her own fair fingers. Her dress is thus described:—

"The queen at length appears; on either hand
The brawny guards in martial order stand.
A flowered cymarr, with golden fringe, she wore;
And at her back a golden quiver bore:
Her flowing hair a golden caul restrains;
A golden clasp the Tyrian robe sustains."

SUMMERS is thy capacity of thought,
All-glorious Genius! smit with wondrous love
Of true and beautiful around, above;
Through earth, through ether hast thou ever sough
To penetrate; thy earnest wish to grasp
The comprehensive laws, which firmly bind
The universe of things, with mystic mind
In close relationship. Seek'st thou to clasp
Finite and infinite within thy arms.
Decisive, independent, daring, bold,
Nor fear nor danger hath thy course controlled;
But onward soaring, scorning all alarms;
The Present, Future, and the mighty Past—
One boundless theatre is thine at last.

THE DEAF BEAUTY

BY MRS. SARAH J. HALE.

MARIANNE WILLIS, when beheld in an attitude of meditation, was as beautiful a human being as imagination ever drew. Brow, cheek, lips, just such as a young poet would delight to describe, and burn to kiss; and her eyelash, with its long, dark fringe, shaded an eye that merited a whole Petrarch sonnet; and then her graceful form, rounded arm, and delicate hand, each deserved its eulogium. But a beauty who cannot speak, is no more to our intellectual beaux than a statue. And yet, where is the great advantage in having the faculty of speech, if it be only employed in lisping nonsense? Perhaps the subject has never been considered. I wish it might be proposed for a theme, at some of our colleges; it would doubtless elicit as many new ideas from the young students, as a "dissertation on the comparative advantages of Greek and Roman literature."

Marianne Willis was called the "deaf beauty," and she was the only beauty I ever knew who always turned a deaf ear to her own praises. Yet she was not insensible to the admiration she raised; the ardent, admiring gaze of those who, for the first time especially, beheld her, always called a deeper glow on her cheek, and she would cast down her bright eyes, and turn away, exhibiting that modesty of feeling which is so truly indicative of the purity of the female heart.

A person born blind raises, in the beholder, few emotions save pity. We feel, at a glance, the helplessness and hopelessness of the case. It is otherwise when we see those who are deaf. There is usually more animation—eagerness, perhaps, would better express what is meant—in the countenance of such an one, than in that of a person who can speak. There is, too, a hilarity in the smile of the deaf that seems to ask amusement, not sympathy. And then the oddity of their gestures, the quickness of their motions, the restlessness of their glances, are apt to inspire a corresponding vivacity in the mind of the beholder. In short, we feel that the spirit of the deaf one is awake, and can hold converse with ours, and thus it is much less painful to contemplate a deaf than a blind person.

But it was always a positive pleasure to look on Marianne, or rather to have her look on you; she was so lovely, and her features always so lighted up with mirth—it was not till she turned away, and you lost the inspiration of her soul-beaming smile, that the idea of the darkness in which that soul must be shrouded came over yours. The melancholy truth then fell so sorrowfully, that tears, even from firm men, were often the tribute of grief for her misfortune. Tears—one glance from her laughing eyes in a moment dispelled them. She was as happy as she seemed, as happy as she was innocent: she had never known a single sorrow or privation. She had been tended and watched over from the hour of her birth, by the untiring, vigilant, and affectionate care of parents who loved her a thousand times better for the misfortune that made their watchfulness so necessary. They had taught her everything she could be made to comprehend concerning her duties, and scrupulously did she perform them; especially in adhering to truth, she was so strict that never, even in her gayest moments, did a sign or gesture, intended to deceive, escape her.

This charming creature, much more deserving the epithet angelic than the fine and fashionable belles to whom it is so often applied, lived in the retirement, then almost solitude, of one of the western counties in the State of New York. Till she was eighteen, she had never been out of sight of the house in which she was born. About that time, Marianne, to the oft-repeated and urgent request of her aunt, was permitted to visit her, and spend a few weeks in Albany. Her beauty, and the aisé of her air, were so exquisite, that Mrs. Drew, in the pride of her heart, could not resist the temptation of introducing the sweet girl to society, and accompanying her to places of amusement, although Mrs. Drew had promised she would do neither. Mrs. Willis had enjoined it on her sister not to indulge Marianne in pleasures, which, as she did not know existed, she did not require to make her happy: but, should she once taste them, the remembrance might give her a disrelish for those simple enjoyments that had hitherto made her bliss.

Perhaps it will be thought her parents did wrong to allow her to go to Albany, and visit in the family of a fashionable lady. They always blamed themselves. And yet, why should they? When people act from a sincere motive of doing what, on the whole, they deem right and expedient, and calculated to give happiness to others or themselves, should a disappointment of these expectations involve self-reproach? I think not. We may regret misfortune—we should feel remorse only for guilt.

Mrs. Drew should have felt remorse, for she was guilty of violating her word; but she always excused herself from all blame, saying, "Who would have thought just going to half a dozen parties, and a few balls, and once or twice to the theatre, could have been productive of evil consequences?"

At the theatre, Marianne attracted the notice of Captain Hall, a young naval officer, who was on a visit to some friends in Albany. He was astonished, almost annihilated, by the charms of the deaf girl, and determined to see her again. He was a gay and thoughtless man, but generous as well as warm-hearted; and the pity he felt for the misfortune of the fair girl whom he was pleased to style "divine," augmented his passion. Yet he never dreamed of marrying her—that was entirely out of the question; still he wanted to look upon her, to talk about her, and to engross, if possible, her attention. He was not acquainted with Mrs. Drew; but, as his relations were among the honorables of the city, an introduction to her was very easy. She was quite as much flattered by the bow and compliment he made her on his first visit, as he was by the blush and smile Marianne gave him. Thus they were mutually pleased, and he continued to call daily, and accompany them in their walks, and to their parties, always contriving to take the hand of Marianne, and who would suppose he could relinquish it without a pressure? The only way in which he could express a tender compliment.

Marianne did not, at first, seem at all pleased with his attentions; and to flatter her by the usual modes was impossible. She could listen to no praises of her beauty, taste, or mind; but she could feel gratitude for kindnesses; and, unfortunately, she ascribed to the kindness of Hall the opportunities she now so often enjoyed of visiting places of amusement, and she was thankful for his attentions; and it was not long before, when he pressed her hand, he felt the pressure returned.

Mrs. Drew could not but notice the change in her niece. From being constantly cheerful, and testifying pleasure and interest in all she saw, she began to droop and be melancholy, except in the presence of Captain Hall. She watched for him when absent, she met him with unrestrained joy; and yet she would blush, and be offended, if rallied concerning him. It seemed she had an idea that her love for him must be as secret as it was sacred. Mrs. Drew saw all this, and yet she took no measures to prevent Captain Hall from associating daily with her niece.

At the expiration of a month, Mr. Willis came for his daughter; but she refused to accompany him home, and the uneasiness she testified when he urged her to go, made him suspect something besides the attractions of her aunt's house induced her wish to tarry in Albany. After some inquiries, so pointed and particular Mrs. Drew could not evade them, the father discovered the cause of Marianne's tears and emotion. Mr. Willis was a plain farmer, but a man of good sense, and some acquaintance with the world; and, moreover, he had a thorough knowledge of his daughter's disposition. He knew if she could be convinced that there was no truth in the heart of the man she thought loved her, or, at least, that he would pay the same attentions to any other girl whose beauty happened to please him, Marianne would renounce him at once. Mr. Willis, therefore, waited on Captain Hall, and frankly told him the mischief his thoughtless gallantry had caused, and asked of him, as a man of honor, to make the reparation of undeceiving Marianne.

"I admire your daughter's beauty and disposition," said the impassioned young man; "could she but speak, I should prefer her to any woman on earth."

"Yet, as she never will speak, you have no intention of marrying her," replied Mr. Willis, coolly. "I am not intending to upbraid you, sir, any more than myself and sister Drew. We have all been to blame, and now that dear, innocent child, who is as free from guile as an infant, must suffer. It is to shorten the term of her uneasiness that I ask you to undeceive her. The pang of knowing she has been deceived she must endure."

Captain Hall changed color so many times, and, in spite of his efforts, betrayed so much agitation, that Mr. Willis was convinced his daughter was not the only sufferer; yet, as he knew the young sailor would never marry Marianne—indeed, he would not have consented that he should—he deemed it his duty to insist that she should not be left in any doubt on the subject. Captain Hall, at length, agreed to what Mr. Willis proposed.

A party was made at the house of Mrs. Drew, and while Marianne watched, with a feverish restlessness, the entrance of every visitor, Captain Hall made his appearance, escorting two very fine ladies. He attended and talked to them all the evening, paying no attention, except by a distant bow, to Marianne. The next morning her eyes were swollen, and her cheeks pale, yet she insisted on starting for home. Her father consented. As they drove out of the city, they met Captain Hall in a carriage, with one of the ladies he escorted the evening before. Marianne hid her face as soon as she recognized him. He turned pale as he noticed the action, and stopped his chaise as if to speak. Mr. Willis, with a motion of the hand, and a look so determined, yet melancholy, that Hall dared not disregard it, bade him drive on. The carriages passed, and Captain Hall and Marianne never met again.

No allusion was ever made by Marianne concerning her lover; and her parents hoped she would again enjoy the simple pleasures of home, and forget the disappointment she had suffered. But the charm that had made life so pure and pleasant, the charm of thinking the professions of those who expressed affection and interest for her sincere, was departed. She had worshipped truth—she found the world false—her spirit was not formed to endure it; and she could not have recourse to the maxims of philosophy, or, what is far better, the promises of Christianity, to aid her to resign her hopes of felicity here, and seek her portion in that world where truth is bliss. She appeared calm and resigned; but there was in her manner an apathy, almost a deadness of feeling, towards those objects and friends that seemed once to interest every faculty of her mind. She never complained of pain, but she evidently declined; her beauty did not fade; she retained her angelic charms till the last; and, after her pure soul had departed, the clay it had once inhabited looked too holy to resign to corruption and the worm. She was buried beneath the shade of a broad sycamore, and the white rosebush planted at her head still droops over her grave.

LE MÉLANGE.

FRENCH NOVELS.

MISS EDGEWORTH, in a letter dated April 23d, 1838, thus expresses herself concerning French novels: "All the fashionable French novelists will soon be reduced to advertising for a NEW VICE, instead of, like the Roman Emperor, simply for a new pleasure. It seems to be with the Parisian novelists a first principle now, that there is no pleasure without vice, and no vice without pleasure; but that the old world vices having been exhausted, they must strain their genius to invent new; and so they do, in the most wonderful and approved bad manner, if I may judge from the few specimens I have looked at—M. de Balzac, for example, who certainly is a man of genius, and as certainly 'à de l'esprit comme un démon.' I should think that he had not the least idea of the difference between right and wrong, only that he does know the difference by his regularly preferring the WRONG, and crying up all the Ladies of error, as Anges de tendresse. His pathos has always, as the Anti-Jacobin so well said of certain German sentimentalists, and as the Duchess of Wellington aptly quoted to me, of a poetic genius of later days—his pathos has always

"A tear for poor guilt."

CHARM OF A FAMILIAR OBJECT SEEN IN ITS HAPPIEST LIGHT.

MRS. CARTER, speaking of her journey home, in one of her letters to Mrs. Montagu, says, "I need not tell you, for I am sure you feel it, how much I longed for you to share with me in every view that pleased me; but there was one of such striking beauty, that I was half wild with impatience at your being so many miles distant. To be sure the wise people, and the gay people, and the silly people of this worky-day world, and for the matter of that, all the people but you and I, would laugh to hear that this object which I was so undone at your not seeing, was no other than a single honeysuckle. It grew in a shady lane, and was surrounded by the deepest verdure, while its own figure and coloring, which were quite perfect, were illuminated by a ray of sunshine. There are some common objects, sometimes placed in such a situation, viewed in such a light, and attended by such accompaniments, as to be seen but once in a whole life, and to give one a pleasure entirely new; and this was one of them."—Vol. i. p. 117.

VALUE OF A FAITHFUL SERVANT.

"I HEARTILY condole with you on the loss of your housekeeper," Mrs. Carter says in a letter to Mrs. Montagu. "You deserved such a treasure as a faithful servant, by knowing how to set the proper value on it. There would be many more probably of the same character as you describe, if their superiors had generosity enough to consider them, as you do, in a proper light. One too often sees people act as if they thought the dependence was wholly on one side; and as if they had no idea that the several relations of life consist in a mutual aid and reciprocation of benefits."—Vol. i. p. 14.

HUMAN NATURE OPPOSITELY ESTIMATED.

"FROM those that have searched into the state of human nature, we have sometimes received very different and incompatible accounts; as though the inquirers had not been so much learning, as fashioning the subject they had in hand; and that as arbitrarily as a heathen carver, that could make either a god or a tressel out of the same piece of wood. For some have cry'd down Nature into such a desperate impotency, as would render the grace of God ineffectual; and others, on the contrary, have invested her with such power and self-sufficiency, as would render the grace of God superfluous. The first of these opinions wrongs Nature in defect, by allowing her no strength, which in consequence must make men desperate. The second wrongs Nature in excess by imputing too much strength, which in effect must make men confident; and both of them do equally destroy the reason of our application to God for strength. For neither will the man that is well in conceit, nor yet the desperate, apply himself to a Physician; because the one cries there is no need, the other, there is no help."—DEAN YOUNG'S Sermons, vol. i. p. 4.

MORAL IDOLATRY.

‘THE Soul of man, like common nature, admits no vacuum; if God be not there, Mammon must be; and it is as impossible to serve neither, as it is to serve both. And for this there is an essential reason in our constitution. For man is designed and born an indigent creature, full of wants and appetites, and a restless desire of happiness, which he can by no means find within himself; and this indispensably obliges him to seek for happiness abroad. Now if he seek his happiness from God, he answers the very intention of his frame, and has made a wise choice of an object that is adequate to all his wants and desires. But then if he does not seek his happiness from God, he must necessarily seek it somewhere else; for his appetites cannot hang long undetermined, they are eager, and must have their quarry: If he forsake the Fountain of Living Waters, yet he cannot forsake his thirst, and therefore he lies under the necessity of hewing out broken cisterns to himself; he must pursue, and at least promise himself satisfaction in other enjoyments. Thus when our hope, our trust, and our expectations abate towards God, they do not abate in themselves, but are only scattered among undue and inferior objects. And this makes the connection infallible between Indevotion and Moral Idolatry; that is, between the neglect of God’s worship, and worshipping the creature; for whatsoever share we abate towards God, we always place upon something else; and whatsoever thing else we prosecute with that share of love, desire, or complacency, which is due unto God, that is in effect our idol.”—DEAN YOUNG’S Sermons, vol. i. p. 19.

SECRET VIRTUE OF FLOWERS.

“I WAS seated one day,” says TADJAD-DIN AHMED (in his description of the Sanctuary of Jerusalem), “in a place covered with anemonies and camomils; near me was a poor man in rags, who smiled, and from time to time lifted up his voice to sing the praise and the greatness of God. He sang thus: Praise be to him who collects in thee, O holy city, all that is beautiful! who clothes thee with this magnificent robe, and who showers upon thee the treasures of this world and of the next. Sir, I made answer, as to beauty, a man need only open his eyes and be satisfied; but where are these worldly treasures? He replied, there is not one among all the flowers which thou seest, that has not extraordinary virtues known well unto those who study them. Perhaps, I answered, you will show me something to convince me farther, and to make this conversation profitable. Then he took me by the hand, led me some steps towards the sanctuary, plucked up a handful of herbs, and said to me, hast thou a ring or a piece of money? Yes, I replied, giving him a piece of silver. He rubbed it with one herb, and it became yellow like a ducat; then he took another herb and rubbed it again, and it became as it had been before. See, quoth he, the secrets in which the treasures are contained. Praise be to God Almighty.”—Fundgruben des Orients, vol. ii. p. 94.

ILL-GOTTEN GOLD.

“GOLD well gotten is bright and fair; but there is gold which rusts and cankers. The stores of the man who walks according to the will of God are under a special blessing; but the stores which have been unjustly gathered are accursed. ‘Your gold and your silver is cankered, and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat up your flesh as fire.’ Far better have no gold at all, than gold with that curse upon it. Far better let cold pinch this frame, or hunger gnaw it, than that the rust of ill-gotten gold should eat it up as fire. Perhaps you may, once or twice in your life, have passed a person whose countenance struck you with painful amazement. It was the face of a man, with features as of flesh and blood, but all hue of flesh and blood was gone, and the whole visage was overspread with a dull silver gray, and a mysterious metallic gloss. You felt wonder, you felt curiosity: but a deep impression of the unnatural made pain the strongest feeling of all which the spectacle excited. You found it was a poor man, who, in disease, had taken mercury till it transfused itself through his skin, and glistened in his face. Now go where he will he exhibits the proof of his disorder, and of the large quantity of metal he has consumed. If you had an eye to see the souls that are about you, many would you see—alas! too many—who are just like that; they have swallowed doses of metal—ill-gotten, cankered, rusted metal—till all purity and beauty are destroyed. Of all poisons and plagues, the deadliest you can admit to your heart is gain which fraud has won. The curse of the Judge is in it; the curse of the Judge will never leave it; it is woe and withering, and death to you: it will eat you up as fire; it will witness against you: ay, were that poor soul of yours, at this precise moment, to pass into the presence of its Judge, the proof of its money-worship would be as clear on its visage, as the proof that the man we have described has taken mercury is strikingly plain upon him.”

THE VOYAGER.

BY MISS E. S. NORTON.

MOONLIGHT upon the waters!
A cold and sullen gleam.
A shattered bark is floating
Adown the turbid stream.

And gloomy cliffs are frowning
On either side and steep,
And o'er the dark waves casting
Their shadows broad and deep.

The leafless trees are tossing
Their huge arms to and fro—
And like a gibbet creaking
The moaning branches go.

Between the black trunks peering,
Gaunt fearful beasts look forth—
And now a chill and demon blast
Comes stealing from the north.

A cold, unblest moonlight!
With fitful gleam it shone,
While in that boat was steering
An old man pale and wan.

And onward as he glided
Over the darksome wave,
His course a moment pausing,
A backward glance he gave.

What sees he in the distance
Come floating down the stream?
Doth not his sight deceive him?
And is it not a dream?

Ah no! too well he knoweth,
Though weary years have passed
Since he, that sad and lonely man,
Had looked upon them last.

The sweet hopes he had cherished
In happy boyhood's time—
And some that onward lured him
In manhood's early prime.

And pale and lovely corpses,
Mournful they swept him by:
The old man gazed upon them
With sad and tear-dimmed eye.

While dead, and yet so beautiful,
The sweet hopes floated there,
With that cold moonlight gleaming
Upon the long wet hair.

As, one by one, they passed him,
With pale and upturned face,

Of each so well remembered
The features he might trace.

That spectral host swept by him,
And he was left alone;
No sound to break the stillness,
Save the wind's sad mournful tone.

Hoarsely the billow roareth,
And dark clouds veil the sky—
And like an ice-bolt to his frame
The bitter blast sweeps by.

Coldly the snow-flake falleth
Upon his thin gray hair—
Yet not of this he recketh,
Wrapt in his deep despair.

For who shall give him back again
The loved now passed away?
What unto him remaineth,
That lone old man and gray!

His eyes to Heaven he raiseth,
Above that stormy air:
Who, like a sunbeam smiling,
Looks down upon him there?

Ah yes! serenely smiling,
With eyes of love and truth,
Still beckons on the sweetest hope
That cheered him in his youth.

And joy his heart rekindled,
And he wept with blissful tears,
And cried, "Lead on, I follow thee,
Star of my early years!"

"Amid the throng thou wert not
That passed so sadly by;
Though long thou wert forgotten,
Still art thou ever nigh."

And on once more he steereth—
His heart is firm and bold;
He heedeth not the dashing wave,
Nor winter's icy cold.

And as he hastened onward,
To reach his haven far,
That one blest hope above him
Was still his guiding star,

Until, his journey ended,
His toilsome voyage o'er,
His little boat he anchored
Upon a peaceful shore.

WOMAN IN HER SOCIAL RELATIONS.

BY HENRY R. WOODBURY.

To raise the virtues, animate the bliss,
And sweeten all the toils of human life,
This be the female dignity and praise.—THOMSON.

PROBABLY no age has been characterised by so many favorable auspices as that in which we live. The nineteenth century may be appropriately termed the "age of progress," for never before has the march of improvement in the arts and sciences, and the consequent amelioration of man's social and moral condition, been so strikingly progressive. When, aided by the ever-beaming light of history, we endeavor to compare the state of the present with that of past ages, do we not find a field for contemplation so boundless that the mind shrinks from it, conscious of its own inability to perform faithfully so comprehensive a task? But while a change so favorable to man has been going on, while empires have been subverted, the great principles of political liberty promulgated, and the very elements made humble ministers to the "lords of creation," there has been a principle developing itself which cannot fail to excite the warmest admiration of every benevolent heart, the principle which accords to the empire of Woman that degree of dignity and respect which it rightly deserves. Woman—at the mention of this name what associations crowd into the mind!—woman, as sister, wife, or mother, in each and all of these relations, the same gentle, confiding, affectionate, and devoted being, living not for herself, but for those "near and dear" to her. Would you know the depths of Woman's affections? Can you fathom the mighty ocean? Would you know the strength of her love? Can you twist the tough oak, that hath withstood the storms of a century, from its deep-rooted place? Would you comprehend the length and breadth of her sympathies? Can you embrace the world at a glance? Would you learn the scope of her patience? Can you count the sands upon the shore? Would you see the noblest elements of our nature fully developed? Would you behold the triumphs of love, affection, sympathy, and patience, in all their strength and beauty? Where can you find them so fairly exemplified as in "A perfect woman, nobly planned,

To warn, to comfort, and command—
And yet a spirit still, and bright,
With something of an angel light."

In the first place, we shall take a brief view of woman in that relation in which she may exert an influence that will remain as long as life—woman as sister. What a beautiful sphere is here presented for the exercise of all those delicate virtues that adorn her gentle nature! In this relation, what a responsibility rests upon her! How many little acts of kindness she may perform for the younger members of the family, that will tend to make them almost idolise her! What a pure, lovely, delightful influence she may shed about the consecrated shrine of home! With how much earnestness can she enter into the feelings of those around her, rejoicing with them in their happiness, and sympathising with them in their sorrows, cares, or disappointments!

We have never witnessed a more beautiful spectacle than that of a sister sacrificing her own comfort and happiness, to the end that she might gratify a brother whom she almost worshipped. There are elements in woman's nature that adapt her in a wonderful degree to sustain this beautiful relation. The strength of her affections, her fixedness of purpose, her invincible patience, and her native purity of heart—these qualities go far in making her what she should be in this capacity, the subject of our holiest aspirations, the object of our most devoted care. Truly a good sister is a treasure, the value of which we can never fully realise, until circumstances cause us to be separated from it. When in a land of strangers sorrow visits us, it is then we are taught indeed a sister's worth. When we miss the sweet accents of her tongue, pouring into the aching heart the heavenly balm of consolation, and the bright smile of hope playing upon her lip; when she is no longer present to be our guardian angel to cheer, soothe, advise, or bless us by her thousand little acts of kindness, then it is, and only then, that we can truly feel there is no treasure like a sister's love.

We have heard a sister appeal in all the force of natural eloquence to the feelings of a dissipated brother. We have seen the strong man moved to trembling; yes, unnerved by those sweet, earnest, and persuasive tones. And we have known him who was sunk in the lowest depths of degradation and misery to be "rescued as a brand from the burning," through the kind and timely influence which no one but a sister can well exert.

Such is the sister, a guardian angel, a precious treasure, a bright star in the constellation of home. Cherish her as such, and Heaven's richest blessings shall be thy reward! Let not her native gentleness and purity be contaminated by the rough blasts of sorrow and of vice. Hers is a lofty sphere, and the influence she may exert over the younger members of the household will tend, in a great measure, to the promotion in them of all those exalted virtues which are the admiration and the pride of the lovely, pure, and good.

But there is another sphere in which we find woman exerting an important influence—that of wife. There is not probably in the whole life of woman an era so particularly interesting as that at which she assumes this high relation. Up to this period, she has been under the guidance and protection of those who felt the warmest interest in her welfare, and gratified her every wish, so far as was consistent with circumstances. But now she feels that she is about to leave the dear friends of her youth, and to place her unlimited confidence in one who is to prove himself her best friend, and to supply the place, in point of friendly counsel and sincere affection, of father, mother, sister, and brother, or who may act the baser part of the cool, heartless villain. Oh, what an experiment! a dangerous experiment is this, for the young lady of warm and generous feelings, surrounded by all of the best comforts of life, to make. She may be deceived. Thousands have been. She may be fortunate. Well may she rejoice if she is. But let her not forget that there is much depending on herself as regards this matter. In this exalted position, she has a weighty obligation to discharge. It is her peculiar duty in this sphere to make home happy. She will indeed be happy if she succeed in this, and happier by far will be the man who holds her love.

Do we hear you ask, How can woman do this? Wherein consists this grand secret of making home happy? We believe that the first great obstacle in the way of domestic happiness will be found, in the majority of cases, to result from a spirit of discontent. The good wife must possess that best of all qualities—a cheerful and contented spirit. This, in itself, is a source of continual bliss, for it robs life of more than half its cares. It gives a gentleness of manner and a happiness of look to her who possesses it. It sheds a halo of brightness around the holy altar of home, and fans continually the pure and lovely flame of affection. Contentment is, indeed, the sunlight of the soul, inspiring with fresh life and beauty everything which may come in its way. It shows us how to be philosophers, and teaches us to make the best of life, causing us to tread lightly on the thorns that may beset our path. By all means, then, should the wife cultivate a spirit of contentment in its broadest sense, combined with Christian resignation, amidst the most trying scenes of life. The story of the Eastern traveller is a happy illustration of the quality of which we speak. Arriving at the gates of a city late in the evening, he found them closed. Being fatigued, he prepared to take up with such quarters as the nature of the place afforded. "It is God's will, and I am content," said he, as he fastened his horse to a tree. Lighting his lamp, he sat down to read awhile ere he retired for the night. Just then a gust of wind extinguished his light. "'Tis God's will," said the traveller; "he knows what is best." His horse next became restive, broke his fastening, and ran away. Alone, fatigued, and exposed to numberless dangers, the traveller's confidence was still unshaken. "I am content, for it is God's work." Committing himself to the protection of Providence, he soon fell asleep, and slept soundly till morning. On awaking, he found the city in ruins. A band of robbers had entered it during the night, and, after having plundered it and killed the inhabitants, had set it on fire. Then said the traveller, "Truly has the hand of God been outstretched to save me, for, had I reached the city before nightfall, I should have shared the fate of its unfortunate inhabitants. I am content. Blessed be his name who has so graciously preserved me!"

The same spirit of contentment and resignation manifested by the traveller should be an element in the character of her who would be a good wife. If it be an attribute of our nature that we must meet with disappointments and reverses, how much nobler it is in us to encounter them with a resolute and contented spirit, when come they will, than it is for us continually to brood over imaginary evils!

Franklin mentions an incident proving the value of a good wife. Several young mechanics were at work upon a house near his office. One of these always seemed very happy. However cold or disagreeable the day, a smile played upon his face, and he had a kind word for every one he met. Asking him the grand secret of his happiness, he replied, "I have one of the best of wives. When I enter the house after the labors of the day, she greets me with a kiss, then tea is ready, and she informs me of the numerous little acts of kindness she has been doing for my comfort during the day. Who could be otherwise than happy, in the possession of such a wife as mine?" The philosopher adds that he no longer wondered at the happiness of the young man, and enjoins upon wives that they follow the example of her who made home happy.

Let us consider woman in another sphere. If there be one word in our language that is associated more closely with the secret springs of our nature than any other—a word that is fairly enshrined in the heart of every individual, at the sound of which the blood circulates through the system with a freer flow, and the heart throbs with an accelerated speed—in short, if there be a word dearer than any other to the noble generous heart, is not that word Mother? The first accents of the child lisp it: should not the "child of larger growth" revere it? Who does not love its sound? Who does not almost idolize the name of her who gave him being, who watched over him during the hours of his helpless infancy, and with heartfelt delight hailed the first development of his youthful powers, the first faint glimmerings of immortal mind. That ministering angel who regarded not only the physical, but also those nobler, more exalted requirements of her child—the moral and the intellectual—is she not worthy of the highest honor and purest affection that child can bestow? What a beautiful manifestation of filial affection was that exhibited by Napoleon when, after his successes, he was greeted as conqueror, and had assumed the imperial purple! Walking in the gardens of St. Cloud, he met his mother. Half earnestly, half seriously, he extended his hand that she might kiss it. Indignantly she flung it back, and, tendering her own, exclaimed, “C’est à vous à baiser la main de celle qui vous a donné la vie.” Napoleon immediately stooped over his mother’s hand, and affectionately kissed it. This simple act was worthy of the man, and speaks a volume in his favor. There cannot be a truer indication of a good heart than is found in the manifestation of gratitude and love to a mother. Passing through one of our loveliest cemeteries, my attention was attracted by a plain white marble shaft bearing only the inscription, “Our mother.” What a comprehensive epitaph! How plainly does it unfold the secret workings of the souls of those who reared it! What a tale of heartfelt gratitude and filial affection is embodied in that simple phrase, “Our mother!”

Of all the impressions made upon the youthful mind, none are so lasting as those received from a mother. While the rough finger of time may eradicate almost all others, these become, as it were, a part of our nature, controlling motives, exerting a powerful influence over us in all the affairs of life. And this fact is sustained by the evidence of many of the greatest men that have ever lived. Perhaps of all whom the world has honored with the appellation of great, more than one-half might, with the strictest propriety, inscribe on their escutcheons as the motto of their success, the simple word, “Mother.” Truly weighty then are the obligations devolving on woman in the discharge of her duties in this relation. The formation of character is hers. And may she not be in a great measure responsible for the future welfare or misery of her child, just in proportion as she discharges faithfully, or neglects to discharge, her obligations to him? The child is father of the man, and the seed sown in the moulding of youthful character must bring forth good or evil fruit in the harvest of mature age. Ay, its influence will be felt by future generations, and it remains with the mother whether those who in future time may be affected by the acts of her child, shall have reason to bless or curse the name of her who gave him being. So far does the influence exerted by the mother affect the character of the child that we may, with a considerable degree of confidence, make the assertion, Show us a good mother, and we will show you a good son. Many a young man of warm sensibilities and fine intellectual acquirements has been obliged to attribute his want of success in the business of life to the false impressions received from a mother, whose errors (to her sorrow be it said) were errors of the head, not of the heart. In the almost faultless character of a Washington, we see written in lines of living light a true biography of her whose noble virtues were only reflected in the career of so distinguished a son. Let mothers emulate her in the training of their children, and the character of American women shall be placed upon a foundation which no spirit of detraction nor jealousy can ever undermine.

Tossed by the ever-varying blasts of life, the favorite of fortune, or the victim of adversity, man may change. But woman, resigned in the darkest hour, and cherishing hope under the most trying circumstances, still proves the same. Truly has it been said of her, “she loves, and loves forever.”

From yonder low casement issues a faint glimmer of light. ’Tis the lone hour of midnight. Let us for a moment intrude upon the quiet of that lowly dwelling. What is the scene that presents itself to our view? Behold before you the shattered wreck of one whose features, though deeply marked by lines of care and sorrow, prove that she was once no stranger to beauty. She has seen better days; but mark her now! Why does she ply so industriously the needle, and at this late hour? On that miserable pallet, behold those dearer to her than life. They must have bread, and it is for this that that poor woman is sacrificing those few, feeble sparks of vitality which still remain, to bind her broken spirit to its weary tenement of clay. Hard, hard indeed is her lot. Her husband is an inebriate sunk in the lowest depths of misery, and perhaps at this very hour is spending in the dram-shop the scanty earnings of that devoted mother and wife. Sad are the days of that poor woman, sadder still her nights, when, in silence and loneliness, she may brood over her gloomy lot. Many a pure prayer has ascended to the mercy-seat from the inmate of that humble cheerless dwelling; but the object of her heart’s affection remains the same, and she seems to be deserted not only by him who should have been her protector and supporter, but also by that Being who is the guardian and father of all. Dark, gloomy though her lot may be, methinks in a spirit of heavenly resignation she breathes, “Even so, father, for thus it seemed good in thy sight.”

And this is no picture of the imagination; ’tis but “an ower true tale.” Have we not found, in our own experience, instances of a like kind? Have we not seen the calm, resigned, confiding spirit of woman, opposed to the rougher, colder, more hardened nature of man? Have we not witnessed, over and over again, the struggles of earnest, true-hearted woman against that grim-visaged monster, poverty prompted by the noble sentiments she uttered, when at the altar she committed her future destiny into the keeping of the man of her choice? Beautiful, indeed, are those virtues in the nature of woman that only shine the brighter when tested by the stern ordeal of affliction and neglect.

Woman by nature is admirably fitted for her sphere. Although her physical constitution is by far weaker than that of man, she possesses a strength of will, and an energy of purpose, that render her powers of endurance, under affliction or distress, much stronger than his. At the bedside of the sick, on the field of battle, in all the most trying events and accidents of life, we find innumerable proofs of this. Wherever we behold the direful visitations of misfortune, disease, or distress, there also we find the gentle influence of a ministering angel, in the guise of that being who was "last at the cross, and first at the sepulchre." The classic writer of Sunny Side,* after having alluded to the fortitude with which women undergo misfortune and reverses, introduces the following beautiful simile: As the vine, which has long twined its graceful foliage about the oak, and been lifted by it into sunshine, will, when the hardy plant is rifted by the thunderbolt, cling around it with its caressing tendrils, and bind up its shattered boughs, so it is beautifully ordered by Providence that woman, who is the mere dependent and ornament of man in his happier hours, should be his stay and solace when smitten with sudden calamity; winding herself into the rugged recesses of his nature, tenderly supporting the drooping head, and binding up the broken heart.

Woman has been the theme of the poet and the novelist from the earliest times to the present. Some writers who have made her their subject have been more ready to censure than to praise, to ridicule than flatter. But for all such we must make due allowances. We find a Shakspeare, for example, expressing such sentiments as the following: "Frailty, thy name is woman." "Ay me, how weak a thing the heart of woman is!" "These women are shrewd tempters with their tongues." "There is never a fair woman has a true face." But should we not take into consideration the position occupied by woman at the time he wrote, the general laxity of manners that then prevailed, ere we rebuke too harshly the genius of a Shakspeare for having been thus severe with the fairer sex? If another has said,

"Oh, woman, woman, whether lean or fat,
In face an angel, but in soul a cat," we can readily excuse so ungallant a rhyme, supposing, of course, this poor fellow to have wedded a fair shrew. A third has said,

"Women, like moths, are always caught by glare,
And Mammon wins his way where seraphs might despair."

Jilted this one must have been, his beast idéal preferring the adoration of mammon to that of love. Thus if we proceeded, should we not find some good apology for every one? But opposed to such, we find many like these we now cite:—

"When pain and anguish wring the brow,
A ministering angel thou."

"There is that sweetness in a female's mind Which in a man's we cannot hope to find."

"The falling snow descends
To prove her breast less fair—
But, grieved to see itself surpassed,
It melts into a tear."

"Woman, be fair; we must adore thee;
Smile, and a world is weak before thee."

"The world was sad, the garden was a wild;
And man, the hermit, sighed, till woman smiled."

"Without a smile from partial beauty won, Say, what were man? A world without a sun."

"Last, softly beautiful, as music's close, Angelic woman into being rose."

It is thus that authors of undoubted genius have portrayed woman. If some have been too severe in their criticisms, others have been too partial. If some have represented her in all her native purity of heart, as an angel of light, others have shown us how revolting she appears when, regardless of her own high destiny, she has buried, in infamy and disgrace, the existence which Heaven designed should reflect beams of cheerfulness and purity upon the broad-spread waste of life.

The inquiry, can woman approach man in an intellectual point of view? is often made. If we do not bring forward any new arguments to prove the affirmative of this question, we may at least be allowed to express our views in relation to it. The great majority of those who have considered this subject favor the negative. They assert that her reasoning powers may be quicker in their operations, and that her conclusions may be very accurate; but then she lacks that real vigor of thought, so essential to the attainment of intellectual greatness. They deem her too weak and fickle a being to excel in letters, and a knowledge of the arts and sciences. These, they say, do not belong to her sphere. We would by no means be considered an advocate for female rights societies, but deem it perfectly proper that woman in this relation should receive her full meed of praise. Let us for a moment glance at the catalogue of lady writers. Do we not find here the names of many who rank high indeed?—a Martineau, a More, a Hemans, a Hale, a Bremer, an Edgeworth, an Osgood, a Sigourney, a Willard, a Howitt, a Smith, a Forester, a Sherwood, a Landon, a Greenwood,* have not these, with numerous others, performed a truly worthy part in the great world of literature? Then we would refer you to a De Stael, whose gigantic intellect caused even the "Child of Destiny" to tremble at the powerful emanations from her pen. But if those who dissent from our views on this subject ask us where we find a second De Stael, or a second Hemans—viewing them only as grand exceptions to the general rule—we boldly ask in reply, where is your second Shakspeare? where your second Byron? The fact that woman has excelled in literature establishes sufficiently the principle that, under propitious circumstances, she may acquire intellectual greatness. Nor is it at all to be wondered at that she so seldom arrives to an eminence equal with man in this respect, if we consider how great a disparity there is in the early mental training of the two. Of the fact that the intellectual wants of woman are too little attended to in our own country—that the whole system of female education is sadly defective—there can be very little doubt; and when we behold such a reform as is really needed in this, then we may expect to see woman occupying the dignified position which her lofty destiny so richly entitles her to.

* Miss Clarke.

In advocating thus her peculiar claims and privileges, we do not demand too much for her. We would by no means have her introduced into a sphere that does not belong to her; nor would we have her whole attention engrossed by those prevailing excitements in the political world that influence too much the public mind in our progressive age; but we would have her better fitted intellectually for the faithful performance of the lofty trust reposed in her, as the being who is to give an indelible stamp to the future character of our country, and the world. And we should find that this, so far from causing her to assume a false position, so far from making her desire to exercise prerogatives unbecoming to her, would give her a correct view of her own sphere, and of the relations she sustains in it to others. It is generally the case that those who are most enthusiastic in advocating their rights are the very persons who, had they been properly educated, would have plainly perceived the inconsistency and folly of the scheme they vindicate. The great policy of woman in the present age is, we believe, the correction of those errors in sentiment and education into which a few ambitious spirits have betrayed her; proving, by her contempt of everything like agitation or uncalled-for excitement, that her only proper hall of legislation is Home, and that she who makes the politics of home her peculiar study, discharges more faithfully her duty, enhances her own happiness, and that of those about her, adds much to the dignity of her position, and encircles, with an amaranthine wreath of purity and brightness, the cherished name of Woman.

SELF-MADE MEN.

FRANCIS JOSEPH HAYDN, MUSICIAN AND COMPOSER.

FRANCIS JOSEPH HAYDN was born on the 31st of March, 1732, at Rohran, a small town fifteen leagues from Vienna. His father was a cartwright, and his mother, before her marriage, had been cook in the family of Count Harrack, the lord of the village. The father of Haydn held also the office of parish sexton. He had a fine tenor voice, and was fond of music. Having occasion to visit Frankfort-on-the-Maine, he there learned to play upon the harp, and on holidays, and in the intervals of business, he used to amuse himself with this instrument, to which his wife joined the accompaniment of her voice. During these little domestic concerts, Haydn, almost as soon as he could go alone, used to stand between his parents with two pieces of wood in his hands, one of which served him as a violin, and the other as a bow, delighted with the idea that he contributed his share to the music; and such was the impression, even at this early age, which his mother's simple airs made upon his feelings, that to the latest period of his existence he often sang them with unabated pleasure, whilst his own sublime compositions were delighting all Europe.

One Sunday, a relation, whose name was Frank, came to see the cartwright. He was well acquainted with music, and was pleased with the performance which his cousin offered after church for his amusement; but, above all, he was so struck with the astonishing precision with which Haydn, then six years of age, beat time, that he offered to take him home with him, and teach him music.

This proposal was joyfully accepted by the parents; for Frank was respectfully fixed as a school-master at Hamburg, and they thought if, in addition to the general branches of education, their little Joseph could be taught music also, they might be enabled, at a future period, to get him into holy orders, to accomplish which was the summit of their parental ambition.

Haydn accordingly set off for Hamburg with his relation. The first proof he gave of his ability was by performing, on a tambourine, which he found in Frank's house soon after his arrival, an air—though the instrument itself is susceptible only of two tones—which attracted the attention of all who came to the school-house. Haydn found a sharp master in his cousin, and the benefit he reaped from his instructions was such as to enable him not only to play on the violin and harpsichord, but also to understand Latin, and to sing at the parish desk in a style which spread his reputation throughout the canton. Haydn had been two years with his cousin, when it happened that Reüter, the maître de chapelle of St. Stephen's, the cathedral church of Vienna, called at Frank's house in the course of a journey, which he was making for the purpose of seeking out children of musical talents wherewith to recruit his choir. Frank thought it a favorable opportunity to advance the interests of his little relative. He sent for him into the room, and Reüter gave him a canon to sing at sight. The precision, the spirit, the purity of tone with which the child executed it astonished him, and when he returned to Vienna he took Haydn with him, and enrolled him in the choir. From this time Haydn devoted himself to the art with an assiduity that has rarely been equalled—perhaps never excelled. Left entirely to his own guidance, and only obliged, by the rules of St. Stephen's, to practise two hours in the day, he yet regularly studied sixteen, and sometimes eighteen, hours out of the twenty-four. If he was at play with his young companions in the square near St. Stephen's, the moment he heard the organ he would leave them, and go into the church; and the sound of any musical instrument whatsoever was to him a gratification far beyond what he could find in any amusement that could be proposed to him.

When Haydn was thirteen years old, he composed a mass, which he showed to Reüter, who, with that sincerity which is the best proof of real friendship, pointed out to him the faults and inaccuracies with which it abounded; and Haydn, with the good sense and entire absence of vanity which characterized him throughout life, immediately saw and acknowledged the justice of the critique. He was sensible that, in order to avoid committing similar errors another time, a knowledge of counterpoint and the rules of harmony was necessary; but the attainment of such knowledge was attended with difficulties that to him, poor and friendless as he was, appeared almost insuperable. He had no money to pay any person for instructing him, and it was only by abridging himself of food that he was enabled to purchase a few second-hand books which treated of the theory of music, and by the aid of which he endeavored to find out the rules of composition. The life of Haydn was, at this period, an unrelenting scene of labor and privation. His father was so poor that he could with difficulty find bread, and the son being unfortunately robbed of his clothes, all that he could scrape together to refit his wardrobe for him scarcely amounted to eleven shillings. Small as this sum was, Haydn received it with a thankful heart, and a contented spirit. He lodged in a garret, where he could not, piercing as are the winters in Vienna, afford himself the comfort of a fire. The most important piece of furniture was an old harpsichord, falling to pieces in all parts, and little worthy of the honor of expressing all his first thoughts and finest feelings. By the side of this wretched instrument he often pursued his studies until so late an hour of the night, that, benumbed with cold and faint with hunger, he would drop his head upon it, and lose in sleep all uneasy sensations. Yet morning constantly found him alert and happy.

Haydn was about eighteen years of age, when a noble Venetian, named Cornaro, came to Vienna as ambassador from the Republic. He had in his train a musician of the name of Porpora, a Neapolitan by birth, and one of the most celebrated composers of that time. Haydn longed to be acquainted with this man; and having fortunately obtained an introduction into the ambassador's family, in a musical capacity, he was taken by him, along with Porpora, to the baths of Manensdorff, which were the fashionable resort at that time. Neither fashion nor splendor, however, had any influence on the mind of Haydn. He was happy, not because he was in the train of the ambassador, but because he was under the same roof with a man of genius like Porpora, and from whom he hoped to receive instruction in the art to which he was so devotedly attached. To attain so desirable an object, he thought no assiduity wearisome—no offices degrading. He rose every morning earlier even than usual—for, with his ardor and industry, it is not necessary to say that he was always an early riser—in order that he might beat Porpora's coat, clean his shoes, adjust his periwig, and put everything in order for him by the time he should rise. Porpora was so crabbed in his temper, and so whimsical in his habits, that, for the first few days of his attendance upon him, Haydn had nothing but fault-finding and harsh epithets for his reward. It is not, however, in human nature to be otherwise than pleased and flattered with a succession of good offices, tendered with cheerfulness and humility. Porpora began gradually to like the services of Haydn, and the wish to make him some return for them soon followed. This return was of a description of all others to Haydn the most valuable. Porpora began by teaching him the principles and execution of some of his own airs, many of which were extremely difficult; and he then proceeded to initiate him into all the sweetness and expression which have so long rendered Italy unrivalled in vocal music. He also taught him to accompany himself on the piano-forte with spirit and correctness—an art far more difficult of attainment than is generally imagined. In short, Haydn found himself greatly improved, both in taste and knowledge, by the acquaintance he had so fortunately formed with Porpora; and the ambassador, astonished at the rapid progress which this young man, apparently so friendless and destitute, had made in his house, generously endeavored to alleviate the poverty which only made his genius appear the more remarkable; and, on his return to Vienna, allowed him a monthly pension of six sequins, or about three pounds sterling, and admitted him to the tables of his secretaries.

This act of kindness on the part of the ambassador was the beginning of Haydn's future prosperity. He was enabled by it to provide himself with a suit of black sufficiently respectable to allow him to present himself in any society that it might be desirable for him to frequent, and to instruct a few pupils; invariably closing his industrious day by sitting a part of the night at the harpsichord.

Haydn's first productions were some sonatas for the piano-forte; he wrote also a few minuets, waltzes, and serenatas, and the music for an opera, at the request of Curtz, the director of one of the principal theatres, and himself a celebrated buffa performer. For this, including the Tempest, Haydn received about twelve pounds sterling.

In 1758, Haydn obtained a situation in the establishment of Count Mortzen, who had an orchestra of his own, and gave musical parties every evening. Prince Antony Esterhazy, an ardent amateur, happened to attend one of these concerts, which opened with a symphony of Haydn's. The prince was so charmed with this piece, that he requested Count Mortzen to give up Haydn to him, being desirous of making him second leader in his own orchestra. Count Mortzen very generously consented; but, unfortunately, Haydn had not been introduced to the prince, being prevented by indisposition from attending the concert the evening he was present; and he heard no more of his appointment. He had, however, a kind friend in Friedberg, one of Prince Antony's composers, who greatly admired his talents, and determined to take an opportunity of bringing him to the prince's recollection. Accordingly, he requested him to compose a symphony to be performed at Eisenstadt, where the prince resided. Friedberg fixed on the prince's birthday for the introduction of the piece. Scarcely had the performers got to the middle of the first allegro, when the prince, who was seated on his throne and surrounded by his court, interrupted them, and asked who was the author of that fine composition. "Haydn," replied Friedberg, making the trembling composer come forward at the same time. "What!" said the prince, "is it this man's music?" Poor Haydn's complexion was of a very sombre hue, and his countenance, when not lighted up with either genius or benevolence, wore an expression of corresponding gloom. It will be easily imagined that he did not appear to particular advantage on this remark. The prince, however, continued: "Well, Moor, henceforth you remain in my service. What is your name?" "Joseph Haydn." "Haydn! surely I remember that name; you are already engaged to me; how is it that I have not seen you before?" Haydn, abashed by the brilliant circle around him, could make no reply. The prince went on, with somewhat more encouragement in his manner—"Go, and dress yourself like a professor; do not let me see you any more in this trim—your appearance is not worthy of you." Haydn kissed the prince's hand, and retired to one corner of the orchestra, to meditate upon the figure he should make in his new costume. The next morning he appeared in it at the prince's levee, and had the title of Second Professor of Music conferred upon him. The first use that Haydn made of the competence thus secured to him was to acquit himself of his debt of gratitude to a peruke-maker named Keller—who had given him an asylum when he was poor—by marrying his eldest daughter. The match, however, did not prove a happy one.

When Haydn had been in the service of Prince Antony twelve months, that nobleman died, and his title descended to Prince Nicholas, who was, if possible, a still more passionate lover of music. Attached to the services of a patron immensely rich, and fully capable of appreciating his talents; placed at the head of a grand orchestra, and possessing full leisure for study; Haydn now saw himself placed in that happy union of circumstances so rarely found, which at once excites the powers of genius and affords the opportunity of displaying them. From this time, his life was uniformly busy and tranquil.

We do not venture to enter into a critical account of Haydn's music. Its general character is that of romantic imagination. He has been compared to Ariosto or Shakspeare in poetry, and to Claude Lorraine in painting. Liberty and joy breathe throughout his works, the grateful exultation of a mind delighting in the innocent exercise of its exalted talents. He said himself that he was always most happy when he was at work. Haydn's most elaborate performance is the Oratorio of the Creation. He was sixty-three years of age when he began it, and employed two entire years upon it. Its success was in proportion to the pains he bestowed upon it. It was in England that Haydn composed some of his finest pieces.

The last time that Haydn appeared in public was at the palace of Prince Lobkowitz, at the performance of his own Creation by one hundred and sixty musicians, amidst a company of the most illustrious personages in Vienna, all assembled to do him honor. It was the proudest, the most affecting moment of his life; and he took his leave of that society, which he had so long delighted, with tears of gratitude, whilst the most heartfelt eulogiums were bestowed upon him in return. From this time he confined himself entirely to his house and small garden. The last spark of his original enthusiasm flamed forth when the French approached Vienna in 1809. He heard the cannonading of his beloved city. With the small remnant of voice that age had left him, he sang, God preserve the Emperor! It was the song of the swan. Whilst he was sitting at the piano, he fell, exhausted by his emotion, into a kind of stupor: and being taken to his bed, tranquilly breathed his last on the 31st of May, 1809, aged seventy-eight.

THE STEREOSCOPE.

THE Stereoscope must rank amongst the most interesting and most marvellous of modern discoveries. With the aid of this instrument, we now possess the means of transmitting to posterity the exact image of all that is physically remarkable in the present day; at least so much as can be appreciated by the sense of vision.

Those who have not yet had an opportunity of witnessing the effect of photographic pictures in the Stereoscope, can form only a small idea of the amount of astonishment they have yet to experience. When Daguerreotype portraits are first seen with the Stereoscope, a feeling of regret is common to all that this discovery does not date from a more distant time. What would not be the value of a Stereoscope portrait-gallery of our greatest historical characters, including Shakspeare, presenting all the lifelike character, and resembling in every respect the reflection of the human face in a mirror. Unfortunately, the examples of past wonders, a sight of which we must now more than ever lament the loss of, are far too numerous; but now we do possess this astonishing power, it behoves us to think of the future, and not allow coming generations to accuse us of a selfish negligence in not leaving to them a legacy which science has placed at our disposal. It is to be hoped that galleries will be formed, containing all that is most remarkable in the animate and inanimate world of our own time, and that none of the great and beneficent characters of our day will pass away without leaving the light of their countenances for the admiration and laudable curiosity which real greatness must always create. To the generality of persons it must be inconceivable that the combination of two pictures nearly alike can produce such an extraordinary result; and, as the curiosity to know something of the "why and because" of this matter will be felt by all who know nothing of the laws by which the effect of solidity or distance is produced, I may, perhaps, not be trespassing on your valuable space in attempting a popular explanation of how two perfectly flat pictures produce the effect of solidity.

Like cause produces like effect; hence like effects result from similar causes: consequently, as pictures in the Stereoscope present the appearance of nature, it is reasonable to conclude results so nearly alike are produced by similar means. Before entering directly on the causes which produce the effect of solidity, it will be better to clearly understand the qualities of natural images or pictures in their relations to the organs and sense of vision. When a house or landscape is looked at, it is found to possess a quality which no copy on a flat surface by the hand of our greatest artists can produce. This is solidity or distance, and the appearance of objects standing immediately behind each other. In using this term solidity, it should be borne in mind that distance is the same thing; since solids are only made up of the relative distances of parts of a single object. To these qualities may be added another, which is the painting on the retina of each eye pictures of the same object, differing slightly in perspective. This last quality is peculiarly the property of natural pictures, and which distinguishes them especially from paintings. Distance or solidity only enables single objects to produce this curious effect, in which we shall see the resemblance in stereoscopic pictures; the latter, indeed, being only an imitation of the former. Another quality in natural pictures is the necessity of converging and diverging the axis of the eyes when regarding different parts of the picture; to this may also be added change of focus. This latter quality is familiar to all who have used a telescope or an opera-glass, and consists of the slight adaptation of the lenses for different parts of the natural picture. These effects of convergence and divergence of the eyes with focal change are also peculiar to solid objects. It will be readily understood that, as objects are more or less distant, the pupils of the eyes, when regarding them, converge or diverge towards or from each other; objects placed nearly in contact with the end of the nose compel the eyes to converge to the degree of squinting, whilst with distant objects they are nearly parallel.

The accompanying diagram will render this part of the subject quite clear. Suppose three objects in a direct line (e, d, f), and a third similar object in the position c: to the left eye (a) the object f would be invisible; and to the right eye (b) the object e would be also invisible, from the intervention of c; but f is always visible to the right eye, and e to the left eye; consequently, with a pair of eyes, these objects are never invisible. This is the simple explanation of the power possessed by two eyes to see round and behind objects. The convergence and divergence of the eyes may be shown by the same diagram. The eyes, when directed on the object c, are more converged than when looking at d. In other words, c is seen at a much greater angle than d; the rays of light proceeding from c or d compelling the pupils of the eyes to approach or recede from each other. This opening and closing of the visual axis may be fitly compared to the same action in a pair of compasses, and it is by the quantity of this action going on with the eyes that we are enabled to estimate the relative distance of near objects. The eyes, then, may be simply considered as a pair of optical compasses, and the rays of light emanating from the object as the limbs of the compasses. The sensation or effect of distance results from the power which we possess with two eyes to see round and behind objects.

It has been fully explained, in the preceding diagram, how we are enabled to see distant objects, although other objects may intervene; and this is greatly assisted by the necessary change of focus which, whilst it makes the distant object clear and distinct, at the same time makes the near and intervening object less visible. The quality of focal change becomes of more value and importance in cases where the sight of one eye is lost. It may not be generally known that a person suddenly deprived of the use of one eye estimates with the greatest difficulty the distance of objects. It would be almost impossible to snuff a candle with one eye closed, or even to place the finger exactly on any fixed point. The single eye, like the single leg of a compass, cannot at first measure distance; but, after some time, experience teaches the one eye to estimate distance by the change of focus alone, whilst with both eyes we feel and measure distance by the convergence and divergence of the visual axis. The structure of the eye has at all times been quoted as one of the most beautiful illustrations of design and natural mechanism, and certainly the additional discoveries which we may expect to be disclosed by the Stereoscope will not diminish our wonders at the minute and beautiful arrangements by which external pictures are painted on the mirror of the mind. We have, then, arrived to this conclusion, that, to experience the effect of distance or solidity, certain circumstances must exist; to compel the opening and closing of the visual angle, in proportion as the eyes are directed to different parts of the same picture; but, as in an ordinary single picture, like the painting of a landscape, all parts of it are at the same relative distance from the eyes, it follows that the angle of vision is the same for all parts, and, consequently, the sense or feeling of distance cannot be experienced. It matters not whether we look at the foreground or background, there can be no mistake about its being on a flat surface; it gives rise to no feeling of distance; although the idea of nature may be skilfully represented, the most art can do is to imitate the impression of one eye alone. To produce the effect of nature, we must do as nature does: two pictures must be painted, one for each eye, and combined, to produce the sensation of one. This is effected by the Stereoscope, the compound image having all the qualities of the natural picture, each part of it compelling the eye to converge and diverge, as it appears more or less distant. This is the most remarkable part of the Stereoscope discovery, that two pictures on a perfectly flat surface, when combined, should necessitate the same opening and closing of the visual axis as is occasioned by a natural picture where the parts which constitute it are separated by actual measurable space.

We will now proceed to examine the construction of the compound Stereoscope picture. It has already been explained that it is constituted of two pictures, each taken from a different point of sight corresponding with the two eyes; take, for example, a, the simplest form of picture—an arrow standing in a vertical direction through a circle—it would appear to each eye like the diagram. These two designs being all that is necessary to produce, with the aid of the Stereoscope, the effect of one arrow standing through a single circle, with the barbed end uppermost, it now remains to explain how this effect is produced. It is important to know that, in looking at natural objects, both eyes are invariably directed, or converge on the same point, and can only regard a single point at the same time, whilst the Stereoscope enables each eye to look at the corresponding points of two separate pictures. This is, indeed, the whole secret of this instrument, which, by bending the rays of light coming from each picture towards each other, enables each eye to regard a different image at the same time. In the diagram of the arrows, a a and b b are corresponding points, the parts b b being separated by a wider space than a a: consequently, the eyes being each directed on the parts b b will be wider apart, or will have a greater divergence than when looking at a a; and, as parts of the same object in nature give the effect of greater or less distance in proportion as they cause the eyes to converge and diverge, it follows, according to this law, b b should appear at a greater distance than a a; in other words, the barbed part of the arrow should appear uppermost. The annexed diagram may assist the explanation: here the arrows are supposed to be combined, or stand over each other; the eyes ( $c d$ ) being directed on the corresponding points ( $a a$ ), the visual angle will be represented by  $a c d$ ; and when directed on  $b b$ , the angle will be  $e c d$ ; but

$e c d$  is a much smaller angle than  $a c d$ ; consequently,  $a a$ , or the barbed part of the arrow, must appear the nearest; that such is the fact may be proved by experiment. When this law is understood, the most curious effects may be produced by equally simple means; the addition of a mere dot, or a single line, to a diagram, will be all that is necessary to make it stand out from the surface on which it is drawn. The following are illustrations of some of the simplest forms of stereoscopic pictures: the first is intended to produce the effect of one ball standing before the other; the second, the effect of the barb of an arrow pointing towards the observer; the third, two lines; and the fourth, a nail.

An explanation of the construction of the first image will suffice for the remainder. The balls are supposed to be in a direct line with the left eye; consequently, the left image will be represented by one ball, and the right image by two. This diagram will also serve to show more forcibly how divergence and convergence of the eyes are produced by stereoscopic pictures: the combined pictures of the balls are represented in this diagram. The left eye, being in a direct line, can only see the ball  $a$ , and remains fixed on this point when the right eye is directed to  $b$ : a comparison of the angles will at once show that  $b$  must appear in the background from the increased divergence of the eyes. The singular part of this case is, that only the right eye moves, whilst the left eye is stationary. A mere glance at any geometric stereoscopic pictures will at once show which parts should be in the foreground, and which in the background. All that is necessary is to measure the space between corresponding points of both pictures; those which are widest apart will appear behind those parts which are nearer to each other. In this diagram, the pair of pictures produce opposite effects to each other; the part which stands out in one is behind in the other. The law just mentioned will explain it. In the upper pair,  $a$  is nearer to  $a$  than  $b$  is to  $b$ ; hence the part  $a$  will appear nearest, and vice versa in the lower pair of pictures. We cannot, from vision alone, have the idea of distance; it is only when combined with the actual experience of touch or measurement that we can say one part is nearer than another. Nothing can be more subject to deception than vision: as an example, the reflection of a natural picture in a mirror presents all the effects of distance; yet we know from experience every part of this picture is reflected from a plane surface. Again, the recently-discovered pseudoscope has the effect of making objects exactly the opposite of what they really are: solids look hollow, objects on the right appear on the left, the most distant objects look the nearest, objects approaching have the effect of receding, &c. A natural picture may, then, simply be considered as a picture containing effects which cannot be rendered on a flat surface; all the ideas associated with it, of distance, &c., are the result of a knowledge or experience which is quite independent of the picture itself, although they assist most materially in giving a character to the impression made on the brain. Color also assists in giving an idea of the form of irregular images, and, in a certain degree, may indicate distance by its force or tone. The chief function of color, by which is meant light and shade, is to assist in exhibiting the shape of objects when there is an absence of direct lines. A globe is an illustration of this; without light and shade, it would look like a flat circle.

A few words, in conclusion, on the advancement of photography. The commercial or public application of photographic science in this country has been, in a great measure, confined to the action of light on metallic plates, although most beautiful effects may be produced on a more convenient and cheaper material, and it is probable that this branch of the subject will be more than ever investigated, since stereoscope pictures on metal, from their weight, cost, and other inconveniences, will not be so largely employed as camera pictures on paper.

In the course of this inquiry, many matters have been left untouched, through fear of confusing the subject; the chief object being to show the analogy between the stereoscopic and natural pictures in their relation to the organs and sense of vision. To the scientific man, many of the foregoing explanations will appear unnecessarily explicit and tedious; but we trust, to the great bulk of our readers, we may have succeeded in making this beautiful and remarkable discovery intelligible: in that case, we shall not have failed in proving, in this particular instance, like effects result from like causes.

THE RED EAR; OR, THE HUSKING FROLIC.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

(See Plate.)

IN rural districts, the merrymakings have a natural heartiness about them never seen in cities, towns, nor villages. Overweening self-respect has not come in to fetter the motions of the body, nor to smother the laugh in its free utterance. Feeling and action are in close relationship. You come nearer to nature, untrammelled by custom and unaffected by art.

A merrymaking par excellence is a New England husking frolic. The husking frolic at the South is a different affair altogether. There, it is a congregation of negroes from the various plantations near at hand, who, while they work, make the air vocal almost for miles around with their rude melodies, a few of which have been rendered familiar to ears polite by the "Serenaders" who have so highly amused the public during the past two or three years. But, at the North, the "husking," like the "quilting," draws together the gentle maidens and loving swains of a neighborhood, who meet to enjoy themselves in their own way. And such enjoyment as they have, in kind and degree, is not to be met with every day. In former times, the "husking" was a wilder affair than at present. Straight-laced conventionality is gradually finding its way beyond the city limits, and binding the free spirits of our country maidens. They meet oftener with the "city folks," gradually falling more and more into their habits as they partake more and more of their spirit; and, when they assemble for enjoyment, they check their impulses, restrain their movements, and hush almost into silence the merry laughter that seeks to leap forth like the singing waters of the fountain. No; "huskings" are not what they were. Instead of seeing on the threshing-floor a troop of young men and maidens, stripping from the bright ears of grain their leafy coverings, amid laughter, music, and the mingling of sweet voices, as of old, mere "labor" comes in too often to perform the service, and silently and coldly does its work. Yet, here and there, a farmer, who cannot forget the pleasant times when he was young, sends forth his annual summons after the maize harvest is gathered, and then comes a merrymaking for old and young that is enjoyed in a way never to be forgotten.

Old Ephraim Bradley was a man of this school. If his head grew white under the falling snows of many winters, the grass was fresh and green, and the flowers ever blooming on his heart. With him, the annual "husking" was never omitted. It was like Christmas and Thanksgiving, almost a sacred thing, half involving sin in the omission.

Kate Mayflower, a wild romp of a girl from Boston—at least some in the city regarded her as such—was spending a few weeks in D—, when invitations came to attend a husking party at Ephraim Bradley's. The old man lived some three miles from the village. Kate had heard about husking parties, and her young spirits leaped up when the announcement was made that one was to be held in the neighborhood, and that she was invited to be present. It was a frolic that, from all she had heard, would just suit her temperament, and she set off, when the time came, to make one of the party, in the merriest possible mood.

Evening had closed in on the arrival of the party from D—, who quickly joined some score or two of young people in the large kitchen, where lay heaped up in the centre a huge pile of Indian corn.

"All that to be husked?" whispered Kate, as she entered the room.

"Oh yes; all that and more, perhaps," was the smiling reply. "We have come to work, you know."

"Now, gals," said old Mr. Bradley, who stood looking on as the young folks gathered, with bright faces, around the golden grain, "now for a good old-fashioned time. If there are not half a dozen weddings between this and Christmas, I shall say there is no virtue in red ears."

As he ceased, down dropped, amid gay voices and laughter, the whole company upon the floor, in all graceful and ungraceful positions, in a circle around the pile of corn. Kate alone remained standing, for the movement was so sudden that she could not act with it.

"Here's room for you, Kate," cried one of the girls who had come with her, making a place by her side; and down sank Kate, feeling, for the first time, a little awkward and confused. Beside her was a stout, rough country youth, whose face was all merriment, and whose eyes were dancing with anticipated pleasure. The city girl eyed his rough, brown hands, coarse garments, and unpolished face, with a slight feeling of repulsion, and drew a little from him towards her friend.

"Oh, plenty of room, miss! Plenty of room," said he, turning broadly around, and addressing her with a familiar leer. "The tighter we fit in, the better. Lay the brands close, if you want a good fire."

Kate could not help laughing at this. As she laughed, he added—

"All free and easy here." He had grasped an ear of corn, and was already stripping down the husk. "A red ear, by jingo!" suddenly burst from his lips, in a tone of triumph; and, as he spoke, he sprang towards, or rather upon Kate, with the grace of a young bear, and kissed her with a "smack" that might have been heard a dozen rooms off. Ere she had time to recover from the surprise, and, it must be admitted, indignation, occasioned by this unexpected assault upon her lips, the hero of the first "red ear" was half around the circle of struggling girls, kissing both right and left with a skill and heartiness that awoke shouts of applause from the young "fellers," who envied his good fortune.

That was a new phase of life to Kate. She had heard of kissing as an amusement among young folks, and had often thought that the custom was too good to have become obsolete; but a practical view, and a personal participation like this, was a thing that her imagination had, in none of its vagaries, conceived. An old-fashioned, straight-backed, flag-bottomed chair stood near, and, unwilling to trust herself again upon the floor, Kate drew that into the circle, and seated herself close to the pile of corn just as the young man had completed his task of kissing every girl in the room.

"First-rate that!" said he, smacking his lips, as he threw himself at her feet. "Wasn't I lucky?"

Kate's indignation had, by this time, all melted away under a lively sense of the ludicrous, and she could not help laughing with the merriest. Soon another red ear was announced, and then the kissing commenced again. Such struggling, wrestling, screaming, and laughing, Kate had never heard nor seen. The young man who held the prize had all the nerve required to go through with his part, as Kate clearly proved when it came to her turn to receive a salute. Springing from her chair, she fled into the next room; but this only increased his eagerness to touch the lips of "the beautiful girl from Boston," and he soon had his arms around her and his hands upon her cheeks. The struggle was long and well sustained on the part of the maiden; but her fate was to be kissed, and kissed by a rough young countryman whom she had never met before. The deed was done, and then the blushing, panting girl was led back in triumph to the room from which she had escaped.

Red ears were in plenty that evening. It was shrewdly guessed that every young man had come with at least two in his pockets, for all the girls avowed that never before had farmer Bradley's field of corn produced so many. As for Kate, she was kissed and kissed, until making, as she alleged to her friend, a virtue of necessity, she submitted with the kindest grace imaginable; and, if the truth must be told, enjoyed the frolic with as lively a zest as any one present.

At length, the great pile of corn disappeared, and the company arranged themselves for dancing; but they had hardly been on the floor half an hour, when supper was announced—and such a supper as that was! No pyramids of ice-cream or candied oranges. No mock nor real turtle; nor oysters in a dozen styles. Turkeys there were, but not scientifically "boned." No; there were none of the fashionable city delicacies; but, instead, "a gigantic round of beef in the centre of the table was flanked on either side with vegetables. A bouncing junk of corned beef was at one end, and a big chicken-pie at the other. An Indian pudding, of ample dimensions, stood forth between the middle and end of the end dishes, and a giant pot of beans loomed up on the other side; whilst pumpkin-pies, apple-sauce, and a host of other 'fixings' filled up the spaces."

This was the bill of fare for the evening, and our city belle looked on with a new surprise, as she saw the articles disappearing one after another like frost work on window-panes at sunrise. If the good wife did not say on this, as was said on a similar occasion, "Lay hold, and help yourselves, gals—make a long arm; and let the men folks take keer of themselves. If any on you likes turnips squat and buttered, squat and butter 'em to suit yourselves"—at least as hearty and primitive an invitation to go to work on the good things was extended, and no one could complain that it was not acted upon. What followed is best given in the language of one who has already described a similar scene:—

"The guests seemed to do ample justice to the viands; mirth and festivity reigned around the board. Jokes, witticisms, and flashes of fun would occasionally 'set the table in a roar.' All appeared determined to enjoy themselves at the 'top of their bent.'

"Soon as supper was over, all the girls lent a hand, and the table was cleared away in a jiffy. Blindman's buff was then introduced; the company now was uproarious! Dancing was the next consideration. Amos Bunker screwed up his viol, rosined the bow, and 'did up' the toe and heel-inspiring notes of Fisher's Hornpipe; whilst a number of the party, who were somewhat skilled in the terpsichorean art, put in the 'double shuffle rigadon.' Presently the lookers-on caught the enthusiasm, and the whole company, old and young, adepts and novices, took the floor and did their utmost:

'Twas right and left, and down outside, six round and back to back:

Harum-scarum, helter-skelter, bump together, whack!"

"And thus was the husking kept up till the old clock, which stood in one corner of the kitchen, beat out twelve; then broke up this jolly gathering."

So it was at old farmer Bradley's. When Kate went back to Boston, she was free to own that she had enjoyed a new kind of merrymaking, and avowed her purpose to be at old Ephraim Bradley's when the next "husking" came off.

CORN SHUCKING IN THE OLD DOMINION.

(See Plate.)

THE following is by the gentleman who kindly furnished us with the drawing of "Corn Shucking in the Old Dominion."

"I send you a pen and ink sketch, which, though familiar to all from the 'sunny South,' may be a novelty to those residing at the North. It represents corn shucking in the Old Dominion. This is the season of merrymaking among the blacks, who assemble for miles around; and, for a supper of 'hog meat and hominy,' and as much whiskey as will make them merry, will, in a single night, husk the product of a large plantation. The labor of husking is made light by songs, and sometimes the music of a banjo. One man, who is celebrated for his wit and his facility in rhyming, mounts the pile, and treats his sable brethren to a recitative song, describing their joys and sorrows, their loves and their hardships, 'in soul-moving poesy;' at the end of each line the chorus is caught up by those around the pile, and for miles their songs are borne on the still night air, lulling to rest all who are within reach of its soothing influence. The party does not break up till near day, and many find great difficulty in getting home, on account of their seeing double from their night debauch. P. H. C."

The following we extract from "Bryant's Letters from the South:—

"A CORN SHUCKING.—But you must hear of the corn shucking. The one at which I was present was given on purpose that I might witness the humors of the Carolina negroes. A huge fire of light-wood was made near the corn-house. Light-wood is the wood of the long-leaved pine, and is so called, not because it is light, for it is almost the heaviest wood in the world, but because it gives more light than any other fuel. In clearing lands, the pines are girdled and suffered to stand; the outer portion of the wood decays and falls off; the inner part, which is saturated with turpentine, remains upright for years, and constitutes the planter's provision of fuel. When a supply is wanted, one of these dead trunks is felled by the axe. The abundance of light-wood is one of the boasts of South Carolina. Wherever you are, if you happen to be chilly, you may have a fire extempore; a bit of light-wood and a coal give you a bright blaze and a strong heat in an instant. The negroes make fires of it in the fields where they work, and, when the mornings are wet and chilly, in the pens where they are milking the cows. At a plantation where I passed a frosty night, I saw fires in a small inclosure, and was told by the lady of the house that she had ordered them to be made to warm the cattle.

"The light-wood fire was made, and the negroes dropped in from the neighboring plantations, singing as they came. The driver of the plantation, a colored man, brought out baskets of corn in the husk, and piled it in a heap; and the negroes began to strip the husks from the ears, singing with great glee as they worked, keeping time to the music, and now and then throwing in a joke and an extravagant burst of laughter. The songs were generally of a comic character.

"When the work of the evening was over, the negroes adjourned to a spacious kitchen. One of them took his place as musician, whistling and beating time with two sticks upon the floor. Several of the men came forward and executed various dances, capering, prancing, and drumming with heel and toe upon the floor, with astonishing agility and perseverance, though all of them had performed their daily tasks, and had worked all the evening, and some had walked from four to seven miles to attend the corn shucking. From the dances a transition was made to a mock military parade, a sort of burlesque of our militia trainings, in which the words of command and the evolutions were extremely ludicrous. It became necessary for the commander to make a speech, and, confessing his incapacity for public speaking, he called upon a huge black man, named Toby, to address the company in his stead. Toby, a man of powerful frame, six feet high, his face ornamented with a beard of fashionable cut, had hitherto stood leaning against the wall, looking upon the frolic with an air of superiority. He consented, came forward, and demanded a bit of paper to hold in his hand, and harangued the soldiery. It was evident that Toby had listened to stump-speeches in his day. He spoke of 'de majority of Sous Carolina,' 'de interests of de State,' 'de honor of ole Ba'nwell district,' and these phrases he connected by various expletives, and sounds of which we could make nothing. At length he began to falter, when the captain, with admirable presence of mind, came to his relief, and interrupted and closed the harangue with an hurrah from the company. Toby was allowed by all the spectators, black and white, to have made an excellent speech."

VEGETABLE PHYSIOLOGY.

BY HARLAND COULTAS.

It has been proved that plants are composed of a number of cells united together into a definite shape, and developing according to fixed natural laws. But, if plants are formed by the union and growth of cells, then differences in their size, form, and duration are simply the result of different degrees of cell-evolution. Hence it is not by abrupt transitions, but by a beautiful series of gradations, that nature passes from one vegetable form to another.

In forest trees, the evolution of new cells goes on for centuries, and the cells, as they increase in number, become specialized, or arrange themselves into definite parts, such as root, stem, and leaves, each having distinct offices to fulfil in the vegetable economy. In shrubs and herbaceous plants, these parts become successively less and less evolved; the size of such plants being consequently reduced, and the duration of their life proportionably shortened. In the hyacinth and Convallaria magalis, or lily of the valley, the internodes, or naked intervals of stem between the leaves, are non-developed, and the leaves are crowded together, forming a bulb, or rather subterranean bud; some of these leaves retain their rudimentary scalelike character as a protecting envelope, whilst the others rise in a tuft directly from the earth, the flower-stalk springing from their centre. In the Cycadaceæ and Coniferae, those beautiful and highly ornamental whorls of leaves, the calyx and the corolla are absent, and the flower is reduced to the last degree of simplicity, whilst in the ferns it disappears altogether, and in its place we have a collection of mere dustlike spots or lines, arranged, however, with great beauty and regularity on the under surface of the frond. The same plan of structure, or distinction of parts into root, stem, and leaves, is still visible in the minute, but exquisitely beautiful mosses, although the root no longer springs from one extremity of the axis of growth, but from every part of it. In the liverworts, the leaves are reduced to mere imbricated scales, and in the lower forms become blended together into a continuous expansion of vegetable matter called a frond. Finally, in the lichens and algae, root, stem, and leaves disappear, and the whole plant is reduced to a mere plane of cells called a thallus—to a mere row of cells strung end to end, or even to a single cell. Now, as the plan of structure in the more highly organized and complex plants can only be understood by studying the operations of nature in detail, as exemplified in the simpler vegetable forms, we shall commence with these first, this being plainly the most natural and philosophical method of investigation. Let us begin, then, with

PLANTS COMPOSED OF A SINGLE CELL.—The lower forms of the algae afford us several examples of plants thus organically simple. In these plants, vegetation is reduced to its simplest terms. The plant and cell are identical. Here we have the starting-point of vegetation, the beginning of the formation of those vegetable elements which, in their future development, shall clothe the earth's surface with the richest forms of life and beauty. These plants are especially interesting, as furnishing the simplest indications of those processes of cell-growth and reproduction, on an accurate knowledge of which rest the very foundations of all vegetable physiology.

The plant-cell, as it is termed by Schleiden, constitutes an entire vegetable without organs, imbibing food by endosmosis through every part of its exterior surface, which it converts into the materials of its own enlargement or growth, and finally into new cells, which constitute its progeny. Being without lateral compression of any kind, the plant-cell necessarily takes a globular form. But, even when her vegetative productions are thus organically simple, nature is by no means restricted to one uniform pattern; on the contrary, this family of plants presents almost every variety of color, and external appearances so marked and varied as to justify naturalists in regarding them as distinct species.

We select, as an illustration of the plant-cell, the Protococcus nivalis, or red snow-plant, found in the arctic regions, and which also occurs on damp ground in much lower latitudes. In Fig. 1, we have several individuals of this plant slightly magnified, to show the nature of the reproductive process. New cells are seen to originate in the interior of each plant-cell, which gradually take their place, and the new generation thus produced enlarge and give rise to a new progeny in their interior as before. In this manner, this simple vegetation grows on from age to age. Fig. 4 represents a more highly magnified individual of the Protococcus nivalis, showing more distinctly the new cells forming in its interior. The green pulverulent matter which appears on old walls, and on the bark of trees, consists of an unformed mass of free globular cells, which grow and reproduce in this simple manner.

In other species of plant-cells, the mode of reproduction is somewhat different. In Chroococcus rufescens (Fig. 2), the plant-cell takes an oval form, and (Fig. 3) a partition then appears across the cavity of the cell, dividing it into two cells. These two cells are again subdivided by the formation of another septum at right angles to the first partition, as is seen in Fig. 5. The four cells thus formed enlarge and ultimately separate, constituting four new individuals, which propagate in like manner.

In Oscillaria, the plant-cell becomes elongated, or it may become elongated and branched, as is the case with the species Vaucheria, which forms one kind of those delicate and flossy green threads abounding in fresh water, and which are popularly known in some places as brook silk. Fig. 6 is a magnified view of Vaucheria clavata, which consists of a single cell of unbroken caliber, furnished with branches. In one of these branches, at a, a spore is forming. Fig. 7 represents the end of the branch more magnified, with the spore escaped from its burst apex. In this instance, the ramifications of the cell foreshadow, as it were, the stem and branches of more highly organized plants.

ADDISON.

MACAULAY tells us that the Lord-Treasurer Godolphin, though not habitually a reading man, was mortified by the exceeding badness of the poems which appeared in honor of the battle of Blenheim. It was expedient, if not necessary, to the political dignity of the administration, that the victory should be celebrated in better verses than had appeared, and this was the foundation of Addison's introduction to fortune and to fame. Addison occupied a garret up three pair of stairs, over a small shop in the Haymarket. So says Macaulay; but how he found out, and satisfied himself of the fact, that Addison's apartment was so high in the world, he does not tell us. In his humble lodging, he was surprised one morning by a visit from no less a person than the Right Hon. Henry Boyle, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and afterwards Lord Carleton. This high-born minister, says our historian, had been sent by the Lord-Treasurer as ambassador to the needy poet. The result was the poem of the "Campaign," and Addison was instantly appointed to a commissionership. In our days, it belongs to the fitness of things that an English commissioner must be endowed with £1200 a year; with £300 more, if he has the trouble of writing "chief" before his name when he describes himself. In Addison's time, a commissionership signified only £200 a year; but the habits of English life were, in Queen Anne's time, less expensive. Four years afterwards, Addison became a member of the House of Commons for Malmesbury, and attained, finally, the rank of Secretary of State. The Whigs, it must be admitted, have generally been more ready to notice and promote literary ability than the Tories have been.

A LEGEND OF THE SECOND CRUSADE IN THE HOLY LAND.

THE LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF HÁSAN SÁBÁH.

BY MRS. S. H. WADDELL.

CHAPTER V.

THE encampment was in itself a considerable town. Nineteen different languages were spoken, and all of the various noisy transactions witnessed in cities abounded here, only increased tenfold. Huts and stables, with inclosures for horses and cattle, dotted the valleys as far as the eye could reach; and the bell, summoning the Crusaders to mass, matins, and vespers, was as regularly heard as the muezzin from the minaret of the mosque.

I returned home with the Christians and spies of Antioch, and recounted to my father and Al Alpo the dreadful scene I had witnessed. My preceptor raised his hands above his venerable head, as he said—

"What a Sodom! What a Gomorrah! May the crescent yet be their Asphaltites! Never did the neighboring groves of Daphne, in the early days of Antioch, echo such ribaldry when they, Greek-like, invoked Apollo and Diana, as this we see and hear from the camp of these miserable Franks. Ye poor followers of Mohammed, not only executed, but roasted and eaten by those ravening wolves! Heard we ever before of such deeds? Oh, Prophet, who journeyed to the moon in one night, rescue us! How beautiful was the death of thy followers! They flinched not from the axe of thy enemies. And even thy gardens, oh Antioch, which they cut down and doomed to render them ignoble, in their own hands returned them homage by wafting their souls into the fifth heaven in clouds of perfumes. Oh, miserable Al Alpo, that thy gray head should see this day!"

As the imaum ceased, I heard the halting gait of the renegade, and presently saw him come in and sit down by my father. He appeared fatigued, and drew a cushion from the wall;* his eyes were blood-shot, and the expression of them worse than usual.

"Isamo discovered," he said to my father, "a measure of those Franks for the future protection of their foragers; but I shall be even with them, and am now on my way to inform the governor of Isamo's discovery, and to suggest the plan which kept me all night awake; my mind was at work, and sleep is the enemy of thought, you know. See yonder; they have commenced their operations already—tying boats together, and placing planks and sods upon them. I must be off." He rose hastily, and disappeared.

The imaum shook his head triumphantly, and remarked—

"The El-aari, or rebel, was not anciently given to the Orontes for its sluggishness, but rapid and ungovernable current. I think its swift and wayward tide will combat the Franks more successfully than any thought of thine, Phirous, my brother."

"I understand," said my father, "that Isamo is unwilling to return to the camp of the infidels, saying he was too pious to endure the pollution of being roasted and eaten by the emissaries of Eblis; that, if he must die, let him be turned towards Mecca, and not on a spit before the fire of the enemies of Mohammed."

When I visited Valfrino again, I said to him—

"Valfrino, I am attached to you; curiosity induced me first to visit you, and, from apprehension of being put to death or imprisoned, I borrowed an Armenian dress. So far I was culpable, though I designed no injury to cross or crescent, and do not now, for I am neuter in these difficulties; and, should I find temptation to depart from this position, I would take leave of you forever. My mother's first lesson to me was to be true and faithful."

Valfrino looked at me for some time, as if bewildered; he then took both of my hands within his, and said—

"Hásan, if you are a true man, I will ever feel as an elder brother towards you. I cannot suspect one so young of such fiendlike treachery. No, it cannot be; thy nature must be pure and noble, or, by St. Cyprian, thou couldst neither look nor speak in such manner. See, let us make a mutual vow: Should my dear Lord Tancred and myself fall into the hands of the Antiochians, thou wilt befriend us, as I will, by St. Cyprian, thee, should the reverse take place."

We ate salt from the same salver, and I kissed his forehead and cheeks. My heart was now light, and free from oppression for the first time since the capture of Tarsus.

It was some time after this that I was rather late in returning to the city, for Valfrino had been entertaining me with all manner of amusing reminiscences, and he was the best mimic in the world; moreover, I was now his pupil in the game of chess. As I stepped along, thinking I might incur some punishment at home for being so late, and then saying to myself, "No, it cannot be; my father knows how much Valfrino loves me, and that our intercourse is innocent; my mother says, moreover, but for the nature of our acquaintance, I should never leave the walls," two figures appeared before me. They were wrapped up so that I could not distinguish them, and their backs were turned towards me. Presently, I heard one speak in a whisper to the other, and I instantly knew the voice to be the renegade's. He said—

* The Turks build their apartments with an elevation on one or both sides, of a foot in height, next the wall. It is padded and carpeted, or covered with damask; leaning against the walls are square cushions of different sizes, for the accommodation of those who may require a change of position.

"My lord of Tarentum, you say, when I open the gate and surrender the town to you, you will place my person in safety, and pay over to me one hundred purses,* and bestow also a lucrative office upon me for the remainder of my life. But listen, Prince of Tarentum, give me now the pledge, for I trust no man."

Bohemond drew a parchment from his pouch; I saw a ribbon and seal hanging from it, and saw the renegade turn it towards the light of the moon. He appeared satisfied, and added—

"If you hear one stone fall, move not; if two, come instantly. Remember, the hour is midnight."

As he turned from the prince, he encountered me, and saw, moreover, that I was sufficiently near to have heard all that passed.

"Stand, at your peril!" he said, in an agitated whisper.

I did not move; and, in a moment's time, found myself grasped by the shoulder.

"I must poniard him!" said the renegade, drawing his weapon from the scabbard.

"Stay," said the prince; "he will hardly die without a struggle; and see, he is but a boy. I will imprison him where he will be quite safe until after the capture of the city."

I was led to the encampment, and handed over to the very executioner I had seen under such memorable circumstances. "Hold him fast, Bartemus," was all the introduction I had to this beast of a man.

I now felt all of the horrors of my situation. I begged the executioner to send for Prince Tancred's squire, and allow me to speak, in his hearing, one word to him; but he took no notice of me, and commenced singing—

"A headsman I've been a merry long time,
And many have gone over Styx by my hand,
And many to the fields of Elysium I've sent."

"Cease, old Cerberus," said a sentinel. "Thy song is of Satan's own making, and enough to sing one by the very hearing."

He led me to his tent, and, after showing me into it, set himself down in the door-way. I looked around and shuddered. His tent was of the coarsest canvas, filled with implements of his profession; and the very hacked and stained block I saw him place on the sand for the execution of the Turkish prisoners now answered him as a tent-table, on which a dirty iron lamp burned dimly; sometimes it would flicker and nearly leave us in darkness, then blaze with a lurid light and sink again. I was melancholy personified. I had seen enough to know that the renegade had turned traitor as well as apostate, and that Antioch was now to be surrendered into the hands of the Crusaders. I thought of my home, of the murder of my parents and friends, and no form of relief presented itself to my mind. In this state of distraction, I was tormented by the incessant repetition of the headsman's song—

"A headsman I've been a merry long time,
And many have gone over Styx by my hand,
And many to the fields of Elysium I've sent."

I observed that the executioner nodded sometimes, and a thought of jumping over his head and running occurred to me; but I saw that it would be immediate death, and gave it up in despair. Midnight was rapidly advancing, and I listened with agony to every sound.

At length, as if to torment me, he rose, but was too wary to leave the door-way without binding me; so, reaching a cord from the beam which supported his tent, he made fast my arms, and led me to the block. I did not know now but that the order, "Hold him fast, Bartemus," meant that I should be executed; but he only snuffed the wick of his lamp as he said—

"You may think, youngster, that you will catch me napping; but never you mind those signs; I was broad awake all the time. You would never have been given to Bartemus, but for his skill in keeping prisoners. Why, lad, I could tell thee—but he stopped short, and began his song—

"A headsman I've been a merry long time,
And many have gone over Styx by my hand,
And many to the fields of Elysium I've sent."

I replied by saying—

"I have no idea of escape, for I see no way by which I could effect it. I will tell you what; we will make a bargain."

"Oh ho!" he answered, grinning hideously; "so young, and about to bribe! None of that, my lad. If bribery would do any good to those who offer it, Bartemus would never have been trusted with thee, lad."

"You do not hear me, Bartemus," I said. "I have no wish to corrupt you, and only design proposing that you should take me to Prince Tancred's squire; you shall be by my side and hear every word I say, and I will return with you. For this favor, I will reward you by a purse of gold."

* A purse is four hundred dollars.

"How shall I know that you will pay it?" he surlyly remarked.

"I will swear before Valfrino, by the holy Caaba, to give you one of my father's whiskers, should I fail placing in your hand the sum I promise."

"Well," he replied, "that will do. I have heard you people never break an oath bound by a whisker or beard."

I was all anxiety to hurry forward; but Bartemus was too great a tyrant to allow me to walk fast, when he saw that I desired to do so, and moved forward as slowly as a snail. When near the pavilion, I heard the stone fall, and involuntarily started forward, when he, construing this into a disposition to run from him, stopped me instantly, saying—

"So you think to be off, do you? Suppose we return."

And he jerked me around, and was returning, when I said—

"Oh, Bartemus, I did not intend to run from you!"

Before he had time to reply, Valfrino called to him—

"Stop, Bartemus; a word with you."

As he advanced towards us, tears came to my relief. I wept bitterly. He whispered something to the executioner which I could not understand, and I saw him walk off with an air of perfect indifference.

Valfrino cut the cord which bound me, and inquired, hastily, how I came in the hands of the executioner. I had barely time to inform him, and to beseech him to remember our vows and inquire for Zenghi, the Guzel, when men, clashing in armor and arms, rushed by; and presently I heard the dreadful shouts of the capturers of Antioch rend the air in every direction.

I fled through the gate of the city, which was now wide open, and ran to my father's residence. As I entered the gallery, all was as quiet as death; the heavens were refulgently lit with stars, and the moonbeams danced on the rebel waters of the Orontes.

I knocked loudly, and soon saw my father open the door. I hastily recounted all that had passed, and was relieved of the misery I apprehended lest Valfrino should not discover my father's residence, or be killed before he reached it, when I heard his voice calling out—

"Do you say that Zenghi, the Guzel, lives here?"

"Yes, beloved brother," I answered; "here, here!"

He stepped in the gallery, and, in a moment, a bloody cross was fastened securely to the door. He darted off, and my father drew me in and closed the door.

I saw crowds of armed men pass us after pointing at the cross on the door, and thus we escaped death by the very crimson cross I had so often heard denied by my parents, and all who professed an opposite religion.

It was heart-rending to see the city, so recently the theatre of splendor and gayety, now, in a few hours, converted into the abode of wretchedness, murder, and death; the streets literally ran blood, and the wounded and dead formed a pavement of flesh for every part of Antioch.

I wept for joy when I found that Valfrino had escaped even being wounded. At midday, he paid us a visit, and granted my mother a flag to enter the governor's palace in safety. I went with her.

CHAPTER VI.

WHEN we arrived at the emir's palace, we found all of the gates wide open; courts, galleries, and passages were strewed with dead bodies; the "Salon of Perfumes" alone escaped mutilation and death, being protected by a secret door which opened on an antechamber. With a noiseless touch, my mother withdrew the wainscot, and never before or since have my eyes beheld a scene so gloriously beautiful, so absorbingly enchanting. The apartment was very large, and surrounded by gilded sashes, some of which were half open, and peeping through were the most fragrant and healthy roses, honeysuckles, and delicately-blooming asocias; the ceiling was arched, and inimitably painted to represent flowers showered from gilded baskets; two fountains of fine marble poured fragrant water into vases, in the form of shells; the floor was covered with a Turkish carpet, composed of the wool of the shawl-goat mixed with silk, and woven to represent the plumage of the pea-fowl, and bird of Paradise; a deep fringe of gold thread surrounded this, and on each side were divans, covered with embroidered white satin, fringed with gold, and piled with cushions of the same.

As my eyes wandered over this abode of elegance, the "Startled Fawn of Cashmere" bounded wildly from the fountain, behind which she had hid herself, and sprang, full of terror, in my mother's arms. She was a child of twelve years, of magnificent beauty, and the full, dark eye of the fawn was lustrous with terror. My mother sank on a cushion, and drew her by her side; her dress of pink satin, confined by a girdle of diamonds, quivered from the quick beating of her heart, and she breathed with so much difficulty that I snatched a golden cup, which I observed by one of the fountains, and handed it full of water, that my mother might bathe her forehead and temples with it.

I looked for some of her attendants; but she was the only animated being in the apartment.

As the child revived, my mother said, while she parted her fine black tresses—

"Una, dear, compose thyself; I have brought a flag for thy protection, and will take thee home with me."

She held up her snowy hands and clasped them, while tears of gratitude fell on her cheeks, now as colorless as a mound of snow.

It was just at this time that we heard advancing rapidly towards us heavy tramping, interspersed with eager and rough voices. I called to my mother to give me the flag, and saw her look about her, rise hurriedly, and sink as rapidly, as she said, in an agonizing voice—

"Oh Allah, it is lost! It is gone!"

"Up, Una," said I—"up, Una, and assist me to find it. It has a red cross. See beneath those cushions, while I look here."

I was hurrying out, but it was too late; for the door was forced open, and crowds of armed men rushed in.

"Where is Prince Bohemond?" said the foremost man, while high in the air he held a human head.

I looked as he spoke, and recognized the Emir Baghi Seyan. His magnificent turban was still looped with the rarest jewel of the Indian realms, which flashed and gleamed above the straining, unexpressive eyes, and features all stiffened and purple in the writhing distortions of a sudden and violent death. The long, white beard flowed so as to hide entirely the hand which grasped it, and was dyed and streaming with blood. I turned in horror as the soldier repeated—

"Where is Prince Bohemond? By the snaky head of Medusa, I will have my reward! Here is the head of the Governor of Antioch!"

"I am for plunder!" said fifty voices at once.

I saw my mother and Una surrounded; I heard the rattle of scabbards, as swords were unsheathed. All recollection faded before me, and I fell prostrate on the floor.

I must have had a long and protracted fit of illness, accompanied with mental alienation, the result of overwrought feeling; for, when my consciousness returned, I found myself with my parents, Una, and the imaum, seated beneath the long shadow of one of the pyramids of Memphis, on the Lybian side of the Nile.

I can hardly describe my sensations as I woke to life again. My faculties, bewildered and struggling with the dreadful malady which had chained and imprisoned them, recalled to my memory the flickering of an exhausted lamp, and the new scenes by which I was surrounded, known alone to my mind's eye, had been buried in darkness as the vivid paintings discoverable only by torchlight on the subterranean chambers of this ancient country. So slept my memory, until the light of reason suddenly reflected its bright torch upon the imaged chambers of my mind.

I called my father—for the last scenes of consciousness crowded before me, and I wished to apprise him of what I believed him ignorant, and what I knew he would regard as a circumstance of the greatest importance. He rose hastily, and, with a countenance full of anxiety, came to me; and, taking both of my hands within his, sat down by me as he said—

"What will the beloved of my soul have?"

I answered—

"Oh, my father, may Allah give thee life forever! Do you know that Phirouz, the renegade, betrayed Antioch into the hands of the Christians?"

I saw a tear, for the first time in my life, swell, sparkle, and fall from his eyes, as he turned off and remarked to the imaum—

"Hâsan raves yet. Oh, that the hand of Allah would cease to touch so heavily my Hâsan, my only child!"

"Brother," said the imaum, Al Alpso, "there is hope for thee, even from the leech who awaits thy return at Memphis. He is greater in his skill than the Chaldean, even from the Euphrates to Irak Araby."

I called my father again.

"Father, I am not raving; and you shall see that I am not by what I shall say and do. But the renegade, Phirouz, did betray Antioch."

He tore his beard, and covered his face with his robe.

"See," said I, again, "my father, that I am rational; for I recollect the instructions of our imaum, and I know, from what he has taught me, that these pyramids must be the three near Memphis; this, beneath which we are seated, is the largest, and is called 'Cheops.' We are on the western side of the Nile, which, in Sanscrit, the base of so many languages, signifies blue. The inhabitants of this country are supposed to be the descendants of Ham, a son of Noah; and the worship of the Egyptians, the ship of Isis and Osiris, are symbolical of the deluge."

My father and the imaum turned towards Mecca, and fell upon their faces; after which they came towards me, and, each lifting me, placed me in a species of palanquin borne on the back of a camel. My mother and the little girl were next assisted to their seats, and I heard my father say to my mother—

"As soon as we can do so, we must make a pilgrimage to Mecca, and repeat the 'cow';* for Hâsan is recovering. He is demented now only on one subject. Oh, Allah, make us grateful, for Hâsan lives again!"

We journeyed on, followed by the imaum and my father; and, as we crossed several canals which separated Memphis from the pyramids, my dear old preceptor whipped up his mule, and drawing him up by our side, inquired how I now was. I thanked him, and answered that I felt much improved. He raised his turban, as he said—

"Then thanks and praises be forever to Allah! Child of my soul, instruction is never so profitable as when given upon the spot where the event transpired. Here are the identical canals, drawing their waters from the Nile, which furnished the Greeks with the idea of Coccytus, Acheron, and Lethe. You observe, they were designed to separate the cemeteries from the mighty city of Memphis; and you will remember, my son, that those pyramids, whose summits reach even to the first heaven, serve but as a beacon to warn us of our mortality and insignificance. The kings who built these stupendous monuments were hated for their cruelty and heavy exactions; and, when they died, their bodies were hidden and buried in obscurity, to prevent the indignities which they would have suffered from a roused and revengeful populace. Their labor and designs are left to conjecture, and the real kings who projected them are to this day consigned to the mazes of doubt. In this great work, one hundred thousand men were laboriously employed, to be relieved every three months by the same number. Ten years were spent in hewing the stones, and twenty in building. As an evidence of the amount necessary for the support of the workmen, there is now hieroglyphicized on one of the pyramids, the sum of one thousand six hundred talents in silver,* for leeks, onions, and garlic: from this single example, we may form a correct idea of the extent of oppression and taxation at that period. Age after age has left records of this wonder of centuries, and speculations as to the purposes for which they were reared invited the attention of the learned and wise. The opinion of some has been that they were intended for scientific purposes, such as establishing the proper length of the cubit, of which they contain, in breadth and height, a certain number of multiples, and that they gave evidence of a considerable progress in astronomy, from their sides being adapted to the four cardinal points, and the leading passages in these pyramids preserving the same inclination of 26° to the horizon, being always directed to the polar star; their obliquity also is so adjusted as to make the north side coincide with the obliquity of the sun's rays at the summer solstice.

"Again, son of my soul, the learned say that the ancient Egyptians connected astronomy with their funeral and religious ceremonies, and that zodiacs are found even in their tombs. The pyramids, they argue, must have then been originally designed as mausoleums, on a scale of magnificence, grandeur, and durability far beyond any other that ever was or could be invented. Think, Hâsan, that a stone sarcophagus, in a spacious chamber of these noble monuments, was opened, and behold the mouldering bones of the god Apis, or the ox, and beneath him human skeletons; then grope your way through passages and chambers of different dimensions, and lo! embalmed with skilful care, in innumerable sealed jars, another god, the Ibis, or Egyptian stork! What a satire in granite on man!"

We had now passed a large portion of the ruins of old Misr, or Memphis, for they covered three square leagues, and, in all, probably extended even to a greater distance. My mind was deeply impressed with the melancholy grandeur with which Time slowly but inevitably touched with decay the masterworks of man, and I was relieved when we reached a caravansary, surrounded by every Egyptian feature, and yet inhabited by Mohammedans, and kept in the Saracen style.

I recovered rapidly while residing in Memphis, and was strictly enjoined never to mention the renegade even remotely. I pursued my studies as usual, and every evening, while with my mother, I taught Una such lessons as she had leisure to study. The ruins were almost uninhabited, and the caravansary appeared, from several circumstances, to be only a temporary shelter for itinerants. It was very rare that any one called or passed, and we lived in quiet seclusion, associating but little with the two Saracens who were the proprietors of the establishment. My father appeared to be well acquainted with them; but he never permitted me to inquire as to who or what they were.

One day, I was standing before one of those enormous statues of red granite, glaired with varnish of the same color, deeply absorbed in thought, and wondering at its proportions, as it stood forty-five feet above its pedestal, with a breadth, from shoulder to shoulder, of fifteen feet, when I heard, from its opposite side, the following discourse:—

"I tell thee, Phirous Beni Zerri, that sum will not answer. I have a liking myself for the Fawn; she is, indeed, a houri. I know your infamous plan of taking her off, and selling her for a heavy purse; and look, you offer me a paltry sum to betray one who has eaten salt with me, to surrender an orphan into your pitiless hand, the child of Zenghi's soul,* one I have heard him say he loved tenderly, and for whom he felt a father's affection, as she had now no living relation or friend but himself, and that he was training her for his son, Hâsan, who he intended should marry her in two or three years. No, man, I will not agree to your terms. No price should induce such an act in me."

"Well," answered the renegade, "I always thought thee, Marari, only fit to sing songs and tell stories. Thou hast none of the man about thee; thou art cowardly, and a fool!"

Marari, with perfect self-command, replied by a contemptuous laugh, as he said—

"Call me what thou choosest; thy abuse is good fame to any man; and I retort only on my equals, surely never on such as thou."

I saw the tall form of the poet glide off, and I watched him, as he stepped over broken columns and chiselled fragments, until overshadowed by the statue of Sesostris, and next by the ragged and falling walls of the Temple of Vulcan.

The renegade must have been occupied in the same manner as myself, for he remained immovable until the shadow even of Marari's figure entirely faded from the portal of the temple. He now stepped forward, and, as he suddenly encountered me, he appeared convulsed by the effects of surprise and anger. He ran his hand hurriedly in his bosom, as he said—

"By all the fiends, thou shalt tell no more tales! But for thy brain fever, my life would have been taken long since."

He rushed at me, and I shouted—

"Murder! help! Marari!"

The renegade stood calmly by my side, and when the poet came, breathless from the rapidity of the bounds he made to reach the spot, Phirous smilingly remarked—

"Take him to the caravansary to Zenghi, for he is raving again. He says I am going to murder him. Come, I will go along with you."

Marari looked alternately at each of us, and shook his head. I could not say one word, so astonished was I at the ready villany of the man.

We returned to the caravansary, and the renegade immediately sought my father, and, in my presence, informed him of my having accused him of designing to murder me, adding expressions of sorrow for the obstinate continuance of my brain fever, decanting on its horrible effects upon my imagination.

"Brother," answered my father, "I have, in Cairo, pressing business, and so hast thou. Suppose we hasten to my boat on the Nile? And, as Hâsan's malady is always aggravated by thy presence, we had better be off as soon as possible."

Phirous readily assented, protesting "that he avoided appearing at the house on my account, and that, had he supposed I would have been abroad, he would have kept a watch for me until his business was transacted in Memphis, being only desirous to see a certain statue in the ruins which he had never seen; and, designing a journey to Persia, he wished to look at it previous to leaving the country."

I went immediately to my mother, and stated to her my discovery of another act of villany on the part of the renegade. How shall I describe my feelings, when I saw that the only impression the relation of this circumstance made on her was but a renewal of her fears for my sanity!

"Una, sweet fawn," said I, in the multitude of my fears and distresses, "thou wilt not think Hâsan wild?"

The tears of grief and perplexity swelled and trembled in her full, dark eyes, and she turned and looked at me so submissively and sorrowfully that I could only add—

VOL. XLV.—30

"Do this then, Una, for miserable Hâsan: beware at all times of being alone. Take this"—I handed her a small whistle made of a conch—"blow it never but when you need assistance."

Time passed on from days to months, and from months to years, without my ever seeing or hearing of the renegade. During this time, I had ample room to become acquainted with Una, and her piety and noble nature so won and captivated my heart, that I thought a life of seclusion with her, my parents, and the now infirm imaum, the happiest this world afforded.

During my illness and convalescence, Jerusalem had been taken by the Crusaders, and Godfrey of Bouillon crowned king; and, since our residence at Memphis, I heard of his death, and of the establishment of his brother, Baldwin of Flanders, on the throne. But what proved of great importance to us was a discovery I accidentally made, in the fact of the proprietors of the caravansary being Assassins. I was prudently silent on this point, and they were profoundly ignorant of my knowledge of their tenets and political associations. Their residence in Egypt was for political purposes, and they were deeply concerned in the existing measures of the divan and country for subduing the disaffected and placing the young sultan on the throne of his father. Mostali Billah, the Egyptian Caliph, had recently died, and his son, Amer Bihamillah, who was but five years of age, succeeded him. Afdal, who had been vizier in the last reign, was continued in office, and ruled the country in the minority of the young sultan; soon, however, civil dissensions commenced, for Borar, the uncle of Amer, attempted to dethrone him, and seize the government in his own hands. While this was going forward, there was carried on every species of intrigue, and the Assassins were not only concerned in the political compacts of Egypt, but of Syria, Arabia, and Persia. They were employed by crowned heads, statesmen, and, indeed, by factious artisans.

CHAPTER VII.

My father saved but little from sword and fire in Syria. And here it may be appropriate to remark that he never allowed any of the family to revert to the siege of Antioch, and to this day I am ignorant of their manner of rescue from the palace of Baghi Seyan. I have always believed it to have proceeded from the same dear friend who bound, with the magnetic chains of gratitude, this stricken heart. Yes, so long as its feeblest pulsations remain, Valfrino will be found mosaicied there with love, gratitude, confidence, and admiration.

By industry and economy, while living at Memphis, my father added sufficient to his capital to make occasional voyages with merchandise; and, on these occasions, he established my mother and Una comfortably and securely at Cairo, taking me sometimes with him, and returning, on his arrival, to our home the caravansary. My life there was innocent and happy; and, by close study, I now completed my education, and my parents were preparing presents for my marriage day. During this period, I had gone one day, accompanied by the imaum and the two Saracens, to examine the Pyramids, and the whole day was spent by us in excavating and wandering over their subterraneous chambers, passages, and wells; my father had been a week absent on the borders of the Delta, seeking a lucrative situation for us after our nuptials, and there was no one at the caravansary but my mother, Una, and a domestic my father had purchased as an attendant for them. We returned by the red light of the setting sun, covered with dust and much fatigued, and I quickly sought my mother's apartment, with the pleasing idea of rest on her comfortable mats and cushions.

Oh, what awaited me there! The glad and happy countenances, the light of my life, where were they? I looked hurriedly around; the room was in the greatest confusion; furniture in heaps, broken, and turned upside down—and, stretched at full length, with a gagged and bleeding mouth, all covered with a network of cords, lay my mother's servant. This was at once a revelation to me. I had almost forgotten for five years the renegade, and the scene, with the immediate association, had nearly destroyed me. I uttered a piercing shriek, which brought the Saracens and the poor old imaum, rushing one over the other, into my presence. I fell on the floor, and tossed in the agony of my suffering, and now as suddenly bounded up, calling my companions to my assistance. We cut asunder the cords, and withdrew the gag from the poor woman's mouth.

"Oh, speak, Mona, speak!" said I. "Where are they? Where is?"

She replied, as she sobbed violently, "That she could not imagine where they were. A cross-eyed, crippled man led others; they bound her before they left the apartment, and she knew nothing more."

The imaum was too much affected to be in possession of his judgment, and sat weeping and wringing his withered hands. I grew calm from desperation.

"Brothers," said I, "will you assist me?"

They stood perfectly silent.

"Only say what I can do for you in return?" I repeated.

"By the point of my dagger," the elder man answered, "it would be a difficult step just now for us."

I had no wealth to bestow, and I thought of one alternative. Stepping up to them, I whispered my accidental discovery of their tenets and political compact, adding that I had never breathed one word of the subject to a human being.

"Now, brothers, assist me, and unite the strength of some of your tribe with us. And hear me: I will solemnly lend myself to become one of you; my body and mind shall be yours; it is all I possess in this world, and I freely give it—oh, gladly, to redeem those I hold dearer than liberty or life!"

The Assassins left me for a short time, and returned dressed in travelling robes. They withdrew with me until we were alone. The elder Saracen now glided from his bosom a slender dagger, on which I was solemnly sworn, in the name of the Prophet, to abide by the laws of their compact to the last hours of my life. Having finished this ceremony, he next made a slight gash on my arm, in which he stained with blood the dirk, and, holding its bloody point to my breast, pronounced these words—

"Thou art now an Assassin. Shouldst thou ever forsake, or betray us, in law, word, or deed, this sinks into thy heart, to be stained, as the point now is, to the hilt with thy life's blood."

He withdrew it, and, holding it over my head with both of his hands, snapped it into fragments.

"Now, brother," continued the elder Saracen, "thou needest but this"—he placed in my girdle a dagger. "By and by, thou wilt understand the meaning of the inscription on the handle; and, when it is withdrawn from its scabbard, thou wilt find it true steel. It cannot be broken as yonder fragments; such as these are made only for our ceremonies."

The next gave me a robe, of the same fashion and material as his own, saying—

"We must be off as soon as possible. We must endeavor to reach Cairo in as short a time as can be compassed; there we must leave the feeble imaum and thy mother's domestic."

We hurried to our saddles, with a feeling of torpor on my part, interrupted only by the care which oppressed me for the safety of my dear old preceptor. I rode by his side, and led by the bridle the mule on which he was mounted.

All who have ever heard of Egypt have also heard of its pellucid and azure sky. It was now without a cloud, blazing with planets and refulgently set with stars. The moon was full, and sailed in the very zenith of the heavens; while far before us, in perspective, were dotted groves of palmas, and, leading from the desert, was stretched the white and granular sparkle of sands, ending at the gates of Cairo.

As we journeyed near enough to see the domes and minarets rise above the walls of the city, my poor old friend, from long habit, burst forth in tremulous intentions—

"What, beloved of my soul, is man? An ephemeral, who mingles with the dust are the works of his hands, and the devices of his mind in stone and lime, even in wood and upon tablets, remain untouched by time. Yonder, quiver in brilliancy the emanations of El Moazz's mind. He was the founder and builder of El Cahi, or Cairo. Where now even can be found the skeleton of that head which designed the plan and reared the city? A handful of brown dust is all that exists of it; yet that inanimate matter has braved, uninjured, the vicissitudes of centuries. Man's consequence, his pride, his laborious ambition, is, as the poet sings, 'but a troubled and fleeting dream.'

"How many empires have been founded and overthrown on the very sands beneath our feet! There is old Mier, the great Memphis of the Pharaohs, now mouldering beneath the oblivious tide of centuries, and bearing the fractured marks, in its mutilations, of the devastations of Nebuchadnezzar. Once a capital, to be succeeded by Alexandria of the Delta—the commercial key of the 'Macedonian madman.' This, too, must have its day of prosperity, and its day of decay; for the Moslems came, and Forat was the capital, and here are we, my son, now standing at the gate of its successor, Cairo."

We paid our way through a lodge on the wall of the city, and were led by the elder Assassin to a bazaar in the centre of Cairo, the property of a Jew. We found him standing in the door-way when we halted, where he remained until we were all dismounted. The Assassin stepped from his mule to the spot where he was standing; something imperceptible to me passed between them, when the Jew raised his Tartar cap, opened the door, and invited us in. He led us into a large and handsomely furnished apartment; inquired whether we would partake of some cold pelau, or whether we desired repose and refreshment afterwards.

The elder Saracen made all necessary arrangements with him, and, turning to me, said—

"Here, Hâsan, thou canst leave the imaum and domestic in perfect safety."

He now addressed the Jew—

"See, Hadad, we may not meet with Zenghi, the Guzel; thou must say to him, so soon as he returns to the city, that his wife and the child of his soul have been stolen, and that Ali Adam and his son, accompanied by Hâsan, are in pursuit of them." He turned on his heel, followed by his son, and disappeared.

As the day dawned, I saw a dervise enter the chamber and walk directly to my side, where he stood examining me attentively. I felt perplexed, but remained silent, and only placed my hand securely on my dirk, when Ali Adam stopped me by saying—

"Thou must learn to look carefully ere the steel be withdrawn from the scabbard. Come, lay aside thy travelling robe, and, in its stead, dress thyself as a dervise; we go to the Isle of Pharos, near Alexandria. I have seen some of my brethren, and they assure me—for thou wast correct in thy suspicions —that the renegade committed the act, and that he has gone to Pharos."

I need not say with what alacrity I hurried on my disguise, or how my spirits and energy rose as the Assassin divulged this information to me.

After taking an affectionate leave of the imaum and my mother's domestic, we set forth for the Nile, and, in three days, arrived at Alexandria. There was here enough to interest my poor old friend, had he been with us; and, as I passed the great street, two thousand feet broad, commanding so extensive a view of the Mediterranean and Mareotic Lake, I thought of all he would have to say of the designs of the great conqueror in locating the city where it was, and of the former antiquity of the spot, as we passed the baths of Cleopatra, and other places which I could not think of, in the anxious and unhappy state of my mind.

In a few hours, we were in sight of the tower of Pharos, known in ancient days as the Lantern of Ptolemy. We rode parallel to its base, and, from the fire which was kindled on its summit, I could plainly read the inscription of the architect: "Sostratus, the Cnidian, son of Dexiphanes, to the protecting deities, for the usage of seafaring people." Lucian says that the architect coated the marble with plaster, on which one of less durability was placed, to the honor of Ptolemy Philadelphus, who directed its erection, and expended on the tower eight hundred talents.* I observed that there were several residents on, or near the island, and, among others, there was one pointed out to us of a Copt, of immense wealth and influence; he was a Mohammedan in his faith, and had built on his premises a mosque.

We halted at a fisherman's hut, who, supposing us dervises, entertained us with the greatest respect. Ali Adam, while refreshing himself with a mess of fried fish, informed the fisherman that, on the next morning, he would, with his son, perform in the mosque the celebrated religious dance; he also inquired of him as to the visitors and strangers who had arrived during the last week or ten days; but, beyond casting his net, attending the mosque, and rigidly observing the Ramadan, he knew nothing.

We went to the mosque on the third hour of the following day; and I shall never forget the sensations I experienced when, raising my eyes from the marble pavement to the pulpit, a single name, inscribed on a wall richly incrustured with devices in olive-wood, mother-of-pearl, and the finest china, arrested my attention: it was "Allah"—the "still small voice" succeeding storms and whirlwinds. The dress of the dervises is of coarse, white cloth, leaving the legs and arms bare; they perform their fantastic rites every Tuesday and Friday. We were not standing long, before the Imaum of Pharos commenced reading from the Koran; this was succeeded by the melancholy music of a pipe, of which I was musician. The Assassins girded tightly their full robes, and commenced whirling around first slowly, then with incredible rapidity, keeping all the while exact time to the pipe. They would occasionally stop and shout, "There is no God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet." During this dance, they never raise their eyes; but I saw the Assassins scrutinize the whole congregation by side glances; and, from their whirling in one part of the mosque particularly, and only occasionally wandering over and about it, I was satisfied that they had discovered some one of interest to us.

It was on the second day after our attendance at the mosque that I saw, near the borders of the island, a crowd collected, and, from their gestures, I was led to suppose the scene one of great excitement. I hastened to the place, and saw, stretched on the sand, the headless body of a man; his dress was such as men of fortune usually wore, and the girdle which bound his pelisse was set with rich and valuable jewels. I also saw, sitting humbly by his side, with folded arms and downcast eyes, the elder Assassin. He appeared not to notice any one; and, when there was a cessation of clamor, he would repeat passage after passage from the Koran.

He saw me join the mob, and, as usual, receive the deference which, in the East, is always extended to dervises; but he appeared absorbed in funeral and pious prayers, and sat for some time quietly. Presently, he rose, as if about to arrange the corpse for burial, and, elevating his voice, commenced his recitations again, stretching the arms by the side, and placing the feet together, when, most unthought of by me, I saw, for the first time, the short and deformed foot of the renegade. The Assassin again folded his naked arms, bent his eyes to the earth, and walked slowly and composedly to the hut of the fisherman.

I saw nothing of Ali Adam until midnight, when he visited me with a small iron lamp in his hand. Looking around the apartment carefully, he set it down, and secured the door and a small aperture which answered for a window; then, sitting by my side, he said, gravely and composedly—

"Hâsan, what wouldst thou say were I to tell thee that thy bitter enemy, the renegade, whom thou didst lately see stretched on the sand, had endeavored insidiously to poison, by the hand of a stranger, thy father? He dreaded his vengeance, and feared, after the detection of his traitorous act, that he would not be enabled to escape from his pursuit. Three days ago, he sold, to 'the man of the mosque,' as the Copt is called, thy mother and the Fawn, the former as her nurse. 'Gird up now thy loins like a man,' and hear firmly what I shall reveal to thee. The black wing of Azriel has overshadowed the child of Zenghi's soul; spasm after spasm, from her capture until her death, knew but a few hours' interval, and she must have had incessant delirium, for she would say not a word, but constantly endeavored to sound a small conch which she had chained around her neck."

As Ali Adam concluded, I sprang on my feet; large beads of cold dew gathered on my brow, and the hot blood gushed from my nostrils. The Assassin placed his finger on his lip, in token of silence.

"See here, Hâsan," he whispered, unrolling a turban stained with blood, which he had concealed beneath his robe. "See how Phirous has dearly paid for his detestable baseness to those who never injured, but loved and confided in him."

He held, by the gory beard, the head of the renegade. I sickened and turned away from the hideous and fiendlike countenance, which glared, with its glazed and crossed eyes, upon me.

I will now conclude by adding that Ali Adam assisted me in ransoming my mother; but, ere two years elapsed, I was, as I now am, without one living being who could call me kindred or relative.

"T H E N—N O W."

BY H. MERRAN PARKS.

WE parted—not when the evening stars
Hung in the ambient air—
When peace had covered the earth with wings,
And rest was everywhere;
Not when the summer sunlit
Hung o'er the purple rill,
When the cooling ringdove sought her nest
'Mong the shadows upon the hill;
Not in the glory of morning,
When the earth rang jubilee,
When music was going up to heaven
From woodland, vale, and lea:

But when the chilling snow-flakes
Rushed from the bursting clouds,
And danced about the timid flower,
Winding it close in shrouds;
When the wind went moaning along the street
Seeking for children poor,
And found a home in a hovel low
Of a widow, upon the moor;
We stood alone 'neath the roofless trees,
With the snow-flakes falling through,
Falling and freezing upon my heart
As I bade the loved adieu;
We two were there—a moment more,
And the worshipped one was gone:
I turned me and crept to the garden gate
With my frozen heart alone.

Long months have passed, and a pleasant light
Is creeping softly across the hill—
And brighter flowers and other birds
Bathe in the purple rill—
And the wind breathes low and wooingly
To the bird on the swinging bough,
For the summer of earth is come again,
And nature is joyful now;
And the shadows lie gently among the trees
Where we stood on that fearful day—
And the icy crust that covered my heart
The Father hath broken away.

MY COUNTRY COUSIN.

BY MISS MARY E. THROPP.

CHAPTER I.

Though modest, on his unembarrassed brow
Nature had written "gentleman."—BROWN.

"News, ladies, news!" said Frank Foster, putting his head into my parlor window, where a bevy of the young girls of the village had collected, one pleasant June morning, to discuss the events of the little party I had given them the evening before.

"What is it, Frank; what is it?" cried all in a breath. (Don't be shocked, my young fashionables, at this want of ceremony; remember, the young people of our village grew up together.)

"Why, there came a letter by mail, this morning, directed to ———, the distinguished American poet, at this place: besides, I heard through my cousin, Fred. Foster, formerly his college chum, now his correspondent, that he intended spending a month in our village, a week ago; so you see we may expect him certainly—scarcely this week, as it is now Saturday, but soon, as he is already supposed to be here. Now, ladies, I happen to know that he is young, single, good-looking, amiable; and, if I were not disposable myself (a prize, as you all know, well worth securing), I should advise you to 'set your caps,' one and all, without delay."

"Come in, Frank, do, and tell us all about him."

"Not for the universe; I have but half a second left to reach the cars; I shall miss them if I remain here another moment. Oh, les femmes! les femmes! he who lingers is lost: let me resist temptation immediately. Au revoir, ladies, au revoir;" and, bowing gracefully, the gay young man turned away and walked on down the street.

"Oh, Aunt Debbie," said little Nell Thompson, "what a pity we had our party so soon! If he had only come this week, instead of next!"

"Never mind, my dear; I will give you another."

"You will! Oh, girls! did you hear that? Aunt Debbie is going to give us another party."

"Is she? Are you, Aunt Debbie? Oh, you darling woman! Thank you! thank you!" and they crowded round in their glee, thanking and caressing me.

"There, there, my children, that will do: Nelly, my specks, dear, if you please; there, on that table. Thank you. Lucy, will you gather up my sewing? you have overturned my work-basket. See what you have done, Maggie; you have drawn the needles out of my stocking."

"Oh, pardon, pardon, Aunt Debbie; but when shall we have the party?"

"When? week after next; we will decide on the evening between this and that time."

"You will invite the poet?"

"Oh, of course."

"Let me see: I'll wear my salmon-colored silk, it is so becoming to me," said the handsome Helen Houston.

"I'll wear my blue barege," said little blonde Lucy Nelson; "it's so delicate, it suits my complexion exactly."

"We will order new dresses of pale pink satin," said the elder of the two proud Sherwood sisters, "and brother Tom will make the poet's acquaintance, and invite him home to dinner."

"And what will the little Annie wear?" said I, bending down to the sweet but silent girl on the footstool at my feet; "you will wish to captivate also?"

"As for clothes, my worldly effects are something like Ishabod Crane's, portable in a pocket-handkerchief; and, as I have no means of enhancing their value at present, I must e'en make the best of matters: but as to captivating the poet, Aunt Debbie, would you have me try?"

"I would have you try to fulfil your promise to spend a few weeks with me, now that I shall have this party to get up; besides, I have a country cousin coming to visit me next week, whom I should like you to help me entertain."

"Oh, with pleasure; and I can come very well, now that my aunt is staying with us. Mother will not miss me while Aunt Ellison is with her."

"That's a dear obliging girl! Now don't disappoint me; I shall depend on you."

Soon after, the girls left, and after arranging the room, I set about taking up the dropped stitches of my unfortunate stocking, thinking the while of Annie Logan. You shall know more about her, my reader; but first I must premise that, although all the young folks of the village call me Aunt Debbie, I have no earthly right to that title, as I was an only child, and am now a "maiden lady," so far advanced in years that I do not like to publish them. I have a cousin, however, a young cousin, who is "a host in himself." Excuse me, my reader, that neither you nor my young friends in the village are to know more about him at present. I never boast, my reader, either of relations or acquaintances, never! knowing that where boasting is used, it is needed; though I confess to being somewhat egotistical just now: so let me return from the snow of age to the bloom of youth; to one elegant in manner, cultivated in intellect, noble in principle, and beautiful in thought, feeling, and expression—my little favorite, Annie Logan. She was poor, in the estimation of the world, being the only daughter of a widowed mother, who was obliged to keep a boarding-house, and having to teach music for her own maintenance; nevertheless, in all that makes a woman intrinsically valuable, she was rich, abundantly wealthy.

I had taken up all the stitches, folded up my nearly finished stocking, and run the needles through the ball of yarn, when I heard the long, shrill warning whistle of the returning cars. It reminded me of Mr. Cutter's "Song of Steam," and, as I sat repeating to myself that most beautiful lyric, I felt a slight tap on my shoulder, and, turning quickly round, beheld my cousin, carpet-bag in hand. My only living relation! Did he ever appear as handsome to any one as he did to me that morning, when, the first greeting over, I had time to observe him! to watch the ever-varying expression of his fine eyes, and to admire the rich chestnut hair waving over the white, magnificently-developed forehead! I had not seen him since my removal from the country to this village ten years ago, and he was then a quiet, diffident youth, preparing for college. Now, as I sat talking with him, I could not help mentally exclaiming, again and again—How much improved he is! and what a splendid specimen of manhood!

That evening, after he had drawn my easy-chair to the centre-table and placed a footstool under my feet, he seated himself opposite, remarking how homelike and peaceful my little parlor seemed, with its bright light and cheerful fire, to him, who had so long been deprived of the blessings and comforts of home. I sent for my knitting, and we spent a pleasant evening together, my cousin and I, enjoying a conversation frank in character, cheering in tone, and rich in old memories.

CHAPTER II.

She to higher hopes
Was destined. AKENHEAD

"DEBORAH," said my aristocratic old friend, Mrs. Featherstonaugh, at the conclusion of her last long letter, "I have determined to let Florence remain one more winter at the north, in order to perfect herself in music and the languages; and, as it is neither pleasant nor desirable that she should come so far south in midsummer for a few weeks, I should like to have her spend her vacation with you. You will take good care of my daughter, my true friend, and will be a watchful guardian, I trust. I do not wish to have her make any new acquaintances. You know well that, although an American, I am no lover of democracy, and I particularly dislike the present levelling system of society. Besides, I have bestowed so much care and expense on Florence that I anticipate a brilliant début for her next winter in our own city. I am confident that she will be the belle of the season. Pardon a mother's ambition, dear Deborah, and forgive me my 'illiberal views,' as you used to do in 'auld lang syne.' If, as Bulwer asserts, our opinions are the angel part of our nature, I fear you will not give much for mine. Nevertheless, I feel assured that, for the sake of our old friendship, you will regard the trust and value the attachment of

Your sincere friend,
FRANCES FEATHERSTONAUGH.

"P. S. Please insist upon Florence's wearing a large sun-bonnet whenever she goes out."

"Poor Fanny!" thought I, as I refolded the letter; "as narrow-minded and conservative as ever." But there are excuses for her, my reader: though an American, as she says, by birth, she was of English parentage and education, and had married a wealthy friend and countryman of her father's, who was as strenuous a royalist as himself. I could not help smiling at the postscript: Did she wish the sun-bonnet to protect her daughter's fair face from the sun, or from the admiring gaze of our village beaux?

This letter was soon followed by Miss Featherstonaugh, who came a few days after my cousin's arrival. I had never seen her before, and when she threw back the long thick green veil that almost enveloped her whole person, I could not but acknowledge that her appearance justified her mother's worldly expectations. She was tall, slender, and stately in figure; distinguished, and at the same time fascinating in manner: but when she removed the close travelling bonnet, and I saw the whole contour of her most perfect Grecian features, her large lustrous eyes, and her magnificent wealth of dark hair, parted smoothly on the centre of her forehead, brushed back, and gathered into soft shining folds at the back of her head, I stood looking at her like one entranced. Never in my life had I seen any one so beautiful, so superb! Recovering myself, I led the way to the apartment prepared for her, and, as she employed herself in various little matters, I could not help following her with my eyes. I was charmed. Well might her proud fond mother say, "My Florence moves like a queen!" Miss Featherstonaugh was somewhat fatigued with her journey, and I left her to rest awhile previous to preparing for dinner. My cousin was out rambling in the woods when she came, but I had the pleasure of presenting him at dinner. I saw by his animated manner that he was as much pleased as myself with this new and delightful acquisition to our family.

Miss Featherstonaugh was rather reserved during the first and second days of her visit; but, owing partly to the simple unceremonious customs of my household, and much more to the really polite and engaging deportment of my cousin, she began to unbend, and soon accommodated herself to our mode of living perfectly. Towards the close of the second evening I opened the piano, and requested her to play. She complied immediately, and played skillfully and well, with taste, beauty, and feeling. She sang too; and, as the fine full tones of her voice floated through the apartment, my cousin joined in, and I, charmed and thrown off my guard by the softening influence of the music, commenced also; but as my poor old cracked voice did anything but add to the melody, I soon desisted, not a little discomfited. But my kind thoughtful cousin insisted upon my singing "Home, Sweet Home" with them, and one or two other old tunes, before we retired.

Next morning, as I had an engagement, my cousin proposed a ride on horseback to Miss Featherstonaugh, which she accepted with pleasure, and soon made her appearance in an elegant blue riding-habit, black velvet cap, and white plumes. Miss Featherstonaugh certainly understood the art of dressing well: she could not have selected a more becoming costume. I saw my cousin regard her with evident admiration when he entered to say that all was in readiness. I watched them mount from the piazza, and, as they rode off, gracefully bowing their adieux, I could not help building an "air-castle" for them entirely at variance with friend Fanny's injunctions. During their absence, to my great delight, Annie Logan arrived. The sweet girl! there is such an undefinable charm about her that her presence is always desirable. I took great pleasure in presenting Miss Featherstonaugh and my cousin to my little favorite when they returned. While the girls were changing their dresses, my cousin embraced the opportunity to ask me a few questions concerning Annie, adding that he did not care how many more ladies came, if they were all as charming and agreeable as Miss Featherstonaugh. I was about to sound him farther when the door opened, and Annie and Miss Featherstonaugh entered. My cousin arose and offered chairs; but, before they had time to accept, the dinner-bell rang. Never was there a pleasanter dinner party, and never was there a happier household than mine during the week following. The girls drew or embroidered while my cousin read to them, in the mornings; after dinner, we walked, rode, or sailed; and in the evenings we had music, conversation, games, and very often, visitors. I felt almost young again; my heart warmed and expanded in the genial spring-like influence around me, and there came back over the waste of my existence a breath from the far-off morning-time.

Here was the brow in trials unperplexed,
That cheered the sad, and tranquillised the vexed.
Young, innocent, on whose sweet forehead mild
The parted ringlet shone in simplest guise.

CAMPBELL.

AFTER breakfast one morning, when I had sent my cousin to arrange a little matter of business for me, left Miss Featherstonaugh promenading in the piazza, and seen Annie seated in the parlor at her drawing, I went up to my room to write a letter. The windows were all open; and, as I sat at my desk in the corner between a front and side window, collecting and arranging my thoughts, my eyes resting at intervals on the lovely landscape below, and the blue river winding its solitary way afar off, I heard little feet ascending the steps of the piazza, and then a childish voice supplicating in pitiful tones for a few pennies to buy some bread.

"Run away," said Miss Featherstonaugh, "run off home, little ragamuffin; no one encourages beggars here."

I hastened to the window to see who it was, for I knew, from the boy's earnest sorrowful tone, that he was in distress; and I knew, also, that nothing but real necessity would induce any one to beg in our village; but he was gone. Just then I heard the side door open, and, going to the other window, I saw Annie come out and go to the child, who was crouching down close to the side of the house crying bitterly.

"There, there, my little man, don't cry so: here's a shilling to buy some bread; run off and get it as fast as you can. But wait: does not your mother live in the little cottage by the old mill?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"And how is it that you are in need of bread?"

"Cos daddy got drunk, and Mr. Miller wouldn't give him any more work, and mother was so sick she couldn't do any more washin'."

"What's your name, my man?"

"Tommy Dale."

"Very well, Tommy; run away now and get the bread, and take it home to your mother."

Poor Fanny, thought I, as I ruminated over this incident, I fear she has thought more of the external than the internal, in forming her child's character. I was sorry that this affair had occurred. To be sure, it was trifling in itself, and Florence was recently from a large city, where there are so many mendicants. Nevertheless, such a want of charity in one so young impressed me unfavorably. I finished my letter and went down stairs. Miss Featherstonaugh and my cousin were engaged in an animated argument on the propriety and impropriety of acting from impulse when I entered the parlor, but Annie was absent. Some time after, she came in, and I knew, from the radiant expression of her ingenuous face, that Annie had been acting from the impulse of her own good heart, and that the family by the "old mill" had been relieved and comforted. Towards evening, as we wandered through the cool shaded walks of my beautiful garden (I am very proud of my garden, reader, and with reason), Miss Featherstonough praised its plan, admired the arrangement of the beds, arbors, and shrubbery in her own peculiarly happy and graphic manner, which lent a charm to everything described not entirely its own, till I was quite delighted, and I felt heartily ashamed of myself for having harbored a thought detrimental to the beautiful being before me. My cousin listened approvingly while he busied himself in gathering and arranging bouquets for us. I noticed in the one he gave to Annie white roses, violets, heart's-ease, and forget-me-nots; but in Miss Featherstonough's I saw, among other symbolical flowers, myrtle, heliotrope, and red roses. As the evening was so charming, and it wanted still an hour of tea-time, we concluded to extend our walk, Annie and I leading the way towards the river, my cousin and Miss Featherstonough following. Indeed it always happened, I scarcely knew how, that my cousin was Miss Featherstonough's companion, whether in riding, sailing, or walking. As we sauntered slowly along the banks of the river, enjoying the refreshing breeze and admiring the sunset, we saw at a short distance in front of us two little boys, the one fishing and the other watching him. They were standing with their backs toward us, and, as we neared them, every word they uttered sounded distinctly over the still water.

"Oh, Harry," said the little watcher, "if I only had a line like that, I'd be happy!"

"Well, Jim, why don't you get one? I only give a sixpence for this at Smith's."

"How can I, when I haint got the money? I've been at mother to git me one for weeks, and she says she haint got the money to spare."

"Won't your father?"

"He don't come back from work at farmer Ripley's till Saturday night; but I don't believe he'd give it to me if he was home. I must jist go without. I never git anything I want, anyhow."

"Come hither, my boy," said Miss Featherstonough.

The child turned quickly round, somewhat startled at the presence of strangers, blushed, and obeyed confusedly.

"Will you get me some of those white flowers on the bank there?"

"Yes, ma'am."

The little fellow ran to comply, and in a few minutes returned with a quantity of the flowers indicated. Miss Featherstonough took them, and put the desired sixpence in his hand.

"Oh, thankee! thankee, ma'am!" and the delighted boy bounded away to his companion to show his treasure.

"How easy it is to give happiness to a child!"

said Miss Featherstonough, her beautiful face reflecting the pleasure she had bestowed; "would it were as easy to obtain it for ourselves!"

The lovely girl, how I had wronged her! I gave her my hand, contrived to get her away from my cousin, walked with her, talked my best to her; but when I turned round to see why she answered Yes instead of No so often, I found her intently regarding my cousin, who was carefully putting the flower she had given him into one of the buttonholes of his coat. Simpleton! I might have known better: was it natural that she should prefer the society of an old woman to that of a young man? I repaired my error, of course. On our way home, we met Laura and Eleanor Sherwood, who invited us to a party at their house for the evening after next. Ah! this reminds me that I had forgotten to mention that the evening for our party came and went by unsignaled some time ago, as the poet had not made his appearance.

As the girls and myself were sitting alone in the parlor early next morning, we heard the ever-welcome postman's ring. Annie flew to the hall, and in a few minutes returned with a couple of letters, which she held high above her head, playfully exclaiming—

"Here they are, Miss Featherstonough, bearing the motto of thine own true knight, 'God and my faire ladye.'"

Miss Featherstonough sprang eagerly forward and snatched them from her hand; but, on glancing at the superscriptions, and seeing that neither was for her, her brow darkened, and with a sudden burst of passion she dashed them on the floor; then, turning to the startled Annie, with anger glowing in every lineament of her face, exclaimed—

"Do you consider that a joke, Miss? If you do, let me tell you that I consider it an insult."

"Oh, I beg a thousand pardons! I assure you I did not mean to offend; I only did it in fun." But without heeding, Miss Featherstonough brushed past her and left the room.

"Oh, Aunt Debbie," said the distressed girl, "what have I done?"

"Nothing, my dear; at least, nothing to merit such an ebullition as that: think no more about it."

"Oh yes, Aunt Debbie, it certainly was very wrong in me, very; I must go and tell her how sorry I am."

"Not now, my dear; do not go now; it will not avail: besides, I have a commission for you to attend to immediately, if you will, so that you may be back in time for breakfast."

What that commission was, my reader, poor old bedridden Nancy Brown, who lives in the cot in the opening at the head of the glen, may tell you herself, if she chooses; it is enough, for the present, to know that it diverted Annie's mind from the contemplation of a disagreeable subject, pleased Nancy, and left me to ponder uninterrupted over Miss Featherstonough's sudden and surprising manifestation of ill-temper, which I regretted, especially as my cousin's eyes and manner had of late evinced something more than friendliness when directed towards her, and, unless my old eyes and specs deceived me, that something was reciprocated too. If a lasting attachment should spring up between them—Oh! I could not think of it: my cousin, with his simple domestic habits and warm heart, could never be happy with a woman reared and educated solely for the world of fashion, even though her temper were serene and changeless as a summer sky. Had I better make him the warder on the watchtower of his own heart, by narrating to him the incident of the letters when he came in? No, I could not do that. I had learned Pope's verse—too thoroughly in my youth to be able to violate its precepts in my old age. Right or wrong, I must let things take their course. But then such a thing might not occur again until it was too late. My poor cousin—he certainly was far too good for Florence Featherstonaugh. Too good for Florence Featherstonaugh! My country cousin! I almost fancied the spirit of the proud mother before me in the loftiness of its avenging wrath. Rest tranquil in thy ignorance of the fact, Fanny—secure in thy fancied elevation. Be assured thou art not alone in thy error. I have met many another in my walk through life who, like thee, chose to assume a superiority over men who, in their calm pride, would not condescend to notice thee or thy airs, save by a quiet smile of pity.

A quarter of an hour later, when we all met at breakfast, Annie was conciliating to Miss Featherstonaugh, and Miss F. was in return—shall I say it?—sulky. My cousin soon perceived that something was wrong, and with a tact and delicacy that I could not but admire, introduced such interesting topics of conversation, and in spite of monosyllabic answers at first, maintained so perfectly his own even, kind, and agreeable manner, that we soon yielded to its influence, and the delightful tone of our intercourse, so rudely dashed aside for the moment, flowed back into its accustomed channel again.

CHAPTER IV.

"Trifles make the sum of life."

"WHAT a beautiful rose-colored tissue!" said Miss Featherstonaugh, stopping to look in at Turner's window, on our return from a shopping expedition an hour later the same morning. On examination, we found it to be of such delicate texture and exquisite coloring, that Miss Featherstonaugh concluded to purchase a dress for the Sherwood party. I urged Annie to get one also, but Miss Featherstonaugh thought it would not be becoming to her.

"Let me try, Annie," said I; and I gathered it into folds and threw it over her shoulder. I thought the effect beautiful over her white dress, and appealed to my cousin.

"What do you think, my cousin?"

"That anything would be becoming to Miss Logan."

A bright blush suffused Annie's face and neck with fine effect, and she looked lovelier than ever in her embarrassment, as she hastily removed the tissue. I turned triumphantly to Miss Featherstonaugh. What a look! Could it be possible she was still angry? I rubbed my specs and looked again, but the hateful expression was gone; she was looking at some fine blonde lace. It might have been merely a contraction of the brow caused by a sudden pain, or, I might have been mistaken, possibly; dim eyes with spectacles before them are by no means infallible. After buying another dress, and some blonde lace to trim both, we returned home. Never was Miss Featherstonaugh more fascinating than during the remainder of that day: she read to us, played, sang for us, obliged us in everything: in a word, was all we could desire, and the hours flew by on "golden wings." The next day, in like manner, passed delightfully away until seven o'clock in the evening, the time fixed upon for the dresses to be sent home, and they were not forthcoming. Half-past seven struck, and still no dresses. Then the girls went up stairs, at my suggestion, to get themselves in perfect readiness, so that they might not be detained when they did come. Eight struck, and I sat down to dispatch a note to the mantua-maker, when a loud ring was heard, and the next minute a young woman entered the parlor in great haste with the dresses.

"Sit down, my good girl, and rest," said I. "Jane, go up to the young ladies and ask them to step down here and put on their dresses, so that they can have the advantage of the large mirrors. Tell them my cousin is in his room writing, and they need not fear interruption."

In a few minutes the girls came down. To draw off their wrappers and put on the dresses was the work of a moment; but the hooking was another matter, as I found to my cost when I tried, and pulled, and tried again to hook Miss Featherstonaugh's, but without success. In the midst of my exertions, I was surprised by a merry, uncontrollable burst of laughter from Annie, and, looking round, I saw her in front of a mirror regarding her image with a half-vexed, half-amused expression: then, catching my eye, she burst out laughing again. No wonder! there she stood with sleeves so tight she could not move, her arms hanging out from her side as if they did not belong to her, and her round slender waist magnified by the loose, awkward-looking body almost to the size of mine, fitting, as Jane said, like a "shirt on a beanpole."

"Why, Annie!" exclaimed I, forgetting my own task in my astonishment, and going towards her, "what in the world's the matter? there must be some mistake here; surely Miss Flinn could never have made such a blunder as this; this body must have been made for some one else. Did Miss Flinn make any other dress of this material?" said I to the young woman, who had taken my place, and was endeavoring to fasten Miss Featherstonough's dress.

"Yes, ma'am; she had one to make for Miss Hall; but Miss Flinn has been too sick to see to the work herself these two days, and I'm afraid the parts of the dresses must have got mixed."

Probable enough, thought I, for Miss Hall was anything but a sylph. All this while the young woman was tugging away at Miss Featherstonough's dress. After incredible exertions, and by dint of superior strength, she succeeded in hooking it at last. Miss Featherstonough went to the opposite mirror to see how it fitted.

"Oh, very nicely indeed! it was a little too tight, certainly; but then it would stretch: true, it was rather wanting in length, but she did not mind that;" and she glanced down at her small feet, in satin boots, which were visible, even to the pearl anklets, with considerable complacency. Just then she reached up her arms to readjust a braid which had fallen from its place, when rip, rip, rip, away went the hooks, one after another, all the way up the back. Miss Featherstonough stood still a moment, as if stupefied; then, tearing off the dress with such violence as to make great rents in the gossamer-like fabric, she crumpled it together between her hands, and dashed it at the poor girl, exclaiming passionately—

"Take that thing back to your mistress, and tell her to make the best of it, for it's all the payment she will ever get from me."

The poor girl looked shocked, confused, and gathered up the dress, irresolute whether to take it or not.

"Do you hear me? Take it back, I say, and tell her what I have told you!" and, with flashing eyes and head erect, she swept out of the room.

"Never mind," said Annie, coming to the young woman's relief, "leave it; it can easily be altered: mine will do very well, too, with a little taking in under the arms—(a little!!!)—do not say anything about it to Miss Flinn; and as to the payment, that will be all right."

"Annie, my dear," said I, "do go up stairs and get ready; put on something as soon as you can, for we shall be late. I will attend to everything here."

After effectually comforting the young woman, I sent her away, and seated myself to wait for the girls, when my cousin joined me, exclaiming—

"What a pity, Cousin Debbie! Oh! what a pity!"

"Why, where were you?"

"Just outside, on the piazza; so near that I could not but hear all perfectly. I did not know what was going on until it was too late to make my escape without being seen from the window near which Annie stood, so I remained quietly where I was."

"But I thought I left you up stairs, writing?"

"So you did; but, thinking it must be time to go, I lighted my cigar and went down to the lawn, so as to be near when the young ladies were ready. After walking to and fro some time, I came and seated myself in the piazza, and soon became so lost in thought that I heard nothing until Annie's laughing arrested my attention. But such passion in one so beautiful, so exceedingly attractive, isn't it deplorable?"

"Very." After a few minutes' pause, he continued—

"Do you know that I had serious intentions of trying to induce her to become your cousin?"

"Heaven forbid!" said I, with more emphasis than I intended: "whatever you do, study well the character of my future cousin before you make her your wife."

"I will, I must; but oh! Cousin Debbie, would you have believed—could you have dreamed of such temper in Miss Featherstonough? Did she not seem nearer perfection to you than any other human being?"

"Whatever she may have seemed hitherto, we now know what she is: let us profit by this lesson, and look beyond mere beauty henceforth, so that we may not be disappointed. But I must go and see after the girls; it is nine now; we shall be even more than fashionably late if we do not hasten."

"There will be no going to Sherwood's to-night, I imagine."

"Oh yes, we must go—some of us, at least—or we should offend irremediably. I will go instantly and see what can be effected."

To my surprise and pleasure, I found Miss Featherstonough completely dressed in a superb light-blue silk, embroidered with white flowers and trimmed with pearls; while Annie, in her wrapper, was arranging some jewels in her hair.

"Fly and get ready yourself, Annie."

"Yes, in an instant; as soon as I fasten this braid."

"What will you wear?"

"Oh, I have a spotted muslin that will do very well; I shall soon be ready."

And in a few minutes she did make her appearance in the spotted muslin, without a single ornament of any kind, except a few natural flowers wreathed through her hair, adorning the crown of beautiful curls God had given her.

"The dahlia and the lily of the valley," whispered my cousin to me as they joined us in the parlor a few minutes after. We were soon at Sherwood's, and Miss Featherstonough, in her rich dress and peerless beauty, shone pre-eminently the belle of the evening. The beaux of the village vied with each other in rendering homage to the elegant stranger. She was in her element; all smiles, all sweetness; and no one, in looking at her, would have dreamed for a moment of the storm that had so lately ruffled the harmony of that angelic countenance. The magnificent creature! she sparkled like a diamond among pearls. My cousin, too, I am proud to say, came in for his share of admiration; he was quite a lion among the ladies. I observed with pleasure that he went about talking with neglected young ladies, and sending partners to the wall-flowers decorating the room. I did not see him go near Miss Featherstonough but once during the evening: it was unnecessary; she was surrounded by admirers. Annie, in her usual self-sacrificing spirit, played most of the evening for the dancers, and would in all probability have remained at the piano all the evening, had not my careful cousin called my attention to the matter by asking me if I knew of no one who would take her place. I soon found a substitute, and it was well that I did so, for I saw, when I came up with my reinforcement, that poor Annie was almost ready to faint with weariness in the close air of the excessively warm room. I led her to a window; my cousin brought some refreshment, and we lingered near it talking together some time. While there, Miss Featherstonough approached us, leaning on Fred. Foster's arm. She chatted gayly with Annie and me, but I observed that she did not once address my cousin. My cousin smiled as he noticed Fred's evident delight at her graciousness, and, as they passed on, whispered, half sorrowfully I thought, "Would that she were as lovely as she seems!"

Before leaving, I persuaded the young folks to fix upon a time for our own party. After some consultation, the evening of Friday week was agreed upon. On starting for home, Miss Featherstonough came and took my arm instead of my cousin's. This was something new. Was she resentful? Next morning Miss Featherstonough was quite cool to my cousin, who left, immediately after breakfast, to go to the city on business. He did not get home in the evening, as he expected, but remained till the close of the next day. How lonely we were without him, and how much we missed his cheerful face and pleasant voice! Miss Featherstonough did nothing but yawn and exclaim against the stupidity of a female coterie. On the evening of the second day, Miss Featherstonough espied my cousin returning, from the piazza, and she even condescended to go half-way down the steps to meet him. Annie, who had been her own sweet obliging self during his absence, remained where she was, just inside the parlor window, reading, until, after having greeted us both, he inquired eagerly after Miss Logan. Then she stepped out, smiling, but blushing a little, as he hastened towards her, his fine frank eyes glowing with pleasure. My cousin had not forgotten us in his absence, as some books which he brought for Miss Featherstonough, some music for Annie, and some fine exotics for myself, amply testified. That was a delightful evening we spent together on my cousin's return, and it would have passed without a shade of unpleasant feeling to mar its harmony but for the visit of a couple of ladies from the village, who, when Annie and Miss Featherstonough played for them, lauded the performance of the former greatly, without evincing the slightest admiration for that of the latter. The truth was, they preferred Annie's playing because they were more accustomed to her style, and comprehended it better than Miss Featherstonough's, which was the result of so much science and skill. Miss Featherstonough was displeased, and then, while under the influence of the "green-eyed monster," spoke disparagingly to my cousin, not only of Annie's music, but of Annie herself. This was the finishing-stroke. My cousin recoiled from this manifestation of moral meanness even with its extenuating circumstances "staring him in the face," and Miss Featherstonough lost irretrievably the last hold of the ascendancy she had once possessed over him. Ah! if we could only impress the truth on our minds that good policy alone, if not principle, requires us to speak well of our fellows, how much evil we might prevent in the world! Blessings on the one who has written—

"Nay, speak no ill—a kindly word
Can never leave a sting behind;
And oh! to breathe each tale we've heard
Is far beneath a noble mind."

Let us promulgate it, one and all, for it is worthy.

Pardon this little digression, dear reader, and forgive my moralising, in consideration of my age and experience.

The next morning my cousin, who is an uncommonly excellent reader, read to us from "Hyperion," and I noticed then for the first time, and often afterwards, that, whenever he read anything touching or beautiful, it was to Annie's expressive face that his eloquent eyes glanced for sympathy. I saw him more than once, when Miss Featherstonough called him to accompany her in our daily excursions, direct a lingering look to the modest girl at my side. He even manœuvred, and occasionally with success, to secure her for a companion. Miss Featherstonough was quick to notice the change, and I saw with pain that she visited her chagrin and mortification on the unoffending Annie. She chose to consider her an inferior, and assumed a superciliousness of manner towards her that was as inexcusable as it was unmerited. Without being positively rude, she managed to annoy and grieve her in various ways. Annie endured patiently and quietly, but she seemed to feel deeply. I tried to restore peace for awhile, but finding it impossible, and remembering that Miss Featherstonough's visit was nearly over, I contented myself with screening Annie as much as I could, while my kind-hearted cousin redoubled his attentions.

Meantime, the evening for the long-deferred, long-expected party arrived. Everybody came, and everybody seemed happy. Miss Featherstonaugh was splendidly attired in lace, satin, and jewels; while Annie, in her simple becoming dress, looked lovely—the very embodiment of youth, grace, and purity. I had procured a musician for the evening, so that my little modest floweret might not bloom unseen in the crowd; and I was rewarded, for I saw many an admiring eye follow the light graceful young figure, and rest on the sweet truthful face of my favorite with evident pleasure. After supper, the young people who had fatigued themselves with dancing returned to the front parlor and stood talking in groups about the room. Miss Featherstonaugh reclined languidly in a fauteuil near the piano, which stood invitingly open, talking with her brother-in-law, who had called, on his return from Niagara, to conduct her back to the city, as the summer vacation was over. Annie stood opposite, talking with little Nell Thompson, while my cousin, leaning against a pillar behind them, seemed to be quietly observing all. As I approached them, I heard Miss Featherstonaugh's companion entreating her to play.

"No," said she, loudly and haughtily, "I am fatigued. Ask that person (indicating Annie); she will oblige you; she is a music-teacher."

I glanced at my cousin. He remained perfectly motionless, but I saw the indignant blood mount to his forehead. "Annie, my dear," said I, determined that she should not play, and wishing to relieve her from her embarrassing position, "will you walk with me in the piazza?"

She accepted my offered arm gratefully, and we went into the piazza, where my cousin soon joined us, begging, as he separated us, and drew an arm of each within his own, to be allowed to insert himself between those he admired most and loved best. I took a turn or two with them, and then excused myself, as I had to return to my guests, who soon after separated for the night. The next week Annie returned home, Miss Featherstonaugh went back to the city, my cousin left, and I was alone again.

CHAPTER IV.

So beautiful thou wert in life!
Thou art lovely even now,
With thy pale sweet face, and shining hair
Smooth parted on thy brow.—M. E. T.

A YEAR has gone by since "the party," my reader, a whole year, with its moral and atmospherical changes. Summer is again abroad upon the earth, with its cloudless skies, its sparkling streams, green waving fields, and magnificent forests; beautiful, glorious summer! My home is here unchanged; but where are the young footsteps that echoed, a twelvemonth ago, through its silent apartments? Some will never bound there again! The gay, the admired, the queenly Florence Featherstonaugh has gone down to the grave. In the springtime, when her friends were preparing a joyous reception, she was borne back to her southern home in her coffin. The proud, stately old mother bowed down over the still white features of her dead child, subdued—crushed. Ah! the great, great leveller, Death! I have just received the sad intelligence; hold the letter, with its black seal, in my hand. It is from Florence's teacher. It speaks of a gay winter, of balls and parties, of admirers, of their dresses, of colds, sickness, and death. The old story, and the old result. With her, "life's fitful fever" was soon over. She sleeps well! But the mother—the poor old broken-hearted mother! Ah! Fanny, my oldest, earliest friend! and was it for this thou hadst waited and hoped, watched and yearned with a mother's impatience and a mother's tenderness? How shall I write to thee? What shall I say to thee in thy bereavement? How can I point upward while the sky lowers above, from which the sun of thy existence has gone down forever? God help thee!

I must wipe my specs; they are not damp, reader, only dusty. I have yet another letter by this morning's mail. It is sealed with red wax, and stamped with my cousin's initials. Yes, it is from my cousin. Let us read:—

"Ever since the suns and showers of April, my cousin, I have been endeavoring to escape from my numerous and absorbing duties, to the quiet and repose of your peaceful home. I hope to succeed, in the course of another week; and now, that the time is so near, I can scarcely wait; my impatient feet are almost willing to wend their way back of themselves.

"I have been very busy and very fortunate since I last saw you; fortunate beyond my most sanguine expectations; and I now feel for the first time, after years of toil and struggle, that I am secure in my elevation.

"I have thought of the events of last summer's visit often, oftener than I can tell you. I sometimes take pleasure, when alone in my room at night, in imagining myself sitting opposite a kind, benevolent old lady with smooth gray hair and spectacles, who knits industriously, ever and anon lifting her mild eyes to my face with such a serene, benignant expression, that I am proud to call her my cousin.

"I am a social, companionable mortal, Cousin Debbie, and I confess to you that the peace and comfort pervading your home penetrated my heart, and made it long for a similar atmosphere. You will not wonder, then, when I tell you that I have built for myself a house in —; one after your own plan, my cousin; and I am surrounding it with a garden after your own heart, which I hope to see you enjoy often. Altogether, it will be a beautiful cage for a stray bird, Cousin Debbie, especially for such a one as I have in view. 'Where?' you ask. It may be singing now, for aught I know, away up among your own pleasant bowers, where I first heard its tuneful voice. I know this much, my cousin, that the little enchantress will come with me to the home I have prepared early in autumn. I have hastened to secure my beautiful captive, and she will soon fold her white wings and nestle close to my heart. Yes, dear cousin, I hope to have the pleasure of presenting to you, before leaving your village, as my bride, and your cousin, the gentle, excellent, and beloved Annie Logan."

Annie Logan! Only think of it! Well done, Annie; well done, my darling! thou hast won a high heart, and a noble name; one that is ringing from the Atlantic to the Pacific; and a heart whose sublime emanations will go sounding down the "tide of time," till time is lost in eternity.

LANDSCAPE GARDENING.

THE FORMATION OF THE FLOWER-GARDEN.

Laying out the area. This is the most difficult part of the business, and is not to be excelled in without a considerable degree of taste and experience. In laying out the area of the kitchen-garden, its destination, being utility, affords in all cases a safe and fixed guide; but the flower-garden is a matter of fancy and taste, and, where these are wavering and unsettled, the work will be found to go on at random. As flower-gardens are objects of pleasure, the principle which must serve as a guide in laying them out must be taste. Now, in flower-gardens, as in other objects, there are different kinds of tastes; these, embodied, are called styles or characters; and the great art of the designer is, having fixed on a style, to follow it out unmixed with other styles, or with any deviation which would interfere with the kind of taste or impression which that style is calculated to produce. Style, therefore, is the leading principle in laying out flower-gardens, as utility is in laying out the culinary-garden. As subjects of fancy and taste, the styles of flower-gardens are various. The modern style is a collection of irregular groups and masses, placed about the house as a medium, uniting it with the open lawn. The ancient geometric style, in place of irregular groups, employed symmetrical forms; in France, adding statues and fountains; in Holland, cut trees and grassy slopes; and in Italy, stone walls, walled terraces, and flights of steps. In some situations, these characteristics of parterres may with propriety be added to, or used instead of, the modern sort, especially in flat situations, such as are inclosed by high walls in towns, or where the principal building or object is in a style of architecture which will not render these appendages incongruous. There are other characters of gardens, such as Chinese, which are not widely different from the modern; the Indian, which consists chiefly of walks under shade, in squares of grass, &c.; the Turkish, which abounds in shady retreats, boudoirs of roses and aromatic herbs; and the Spanish, which is distinguished by trellis-work and fountains: but these gardens are not generally adapted to this climate; though, from contemplating and selecting what is beautiful or suitable in each, a style of decoration for the immediate vicinity of mansions might be composed, preferable to anything now in use. We recommend the reader to peruse certain passages in Cowper's "Task," book iii.: "To deck the shapely knoll," &c.

Masaroni, in the "Gardener's Magazine," vol. ix. p. 60, strongly recommends connection or unison between the several beds or borders of a flower-garden. "Where the shape of any individual bed," he says, "can be changed at pleasure, without injuring or altering the general effect, the flower-garden cannot be considered as approaching to perfection, notwithstanding any sum which extravagance may have been pleased to throw away upon it." He gives, as an example, Fig. 1.

Abercrombie, Nicol, and most practical gardeners, seem not to understand the subject of style, and their rules amount to little more than that of subdiriding the area by paths in different directions. The former author says: "If a piece of ground be set apart for the cultivation of flowers, in what style should it be laid out? This may vary with the quantity of surface, and the object of the cultivator. In the first place, carry a border round the garden, nowhere narrower than three or four feet, unless it may be proper to contract its breadth under the windows of the house; or unless there be a green hedge, on any side, rooted in the level of the garden, which might be expected either to draw the earth, or to encroach on the small plants, in which case flowering shrubs in little slips of mould would do better than dwarf-stemmed flowers. In contact with the surrounding border may be either a grass-plot or a gravel walk. The latter is most convenient for approach at all seasons. If the ground be at all dilated, handsome walks crossing or leading to the centre will be also requisite: let the principal walks be five or six feet in breadth. The interior of the garden is usually laid out in oblong beds, three or four feet wide, with intervening alleys two feet wide, or from that down to twelve inches, when it is intended to abstract as little space as possible from the cultivation of the flowers; or the same end may be obtained by circular or oval beds, with smaller compartments between, of such a form as will leave the alleys of one regular width."

According to Nicol, the laying out of flower-gardens is a "matter very much of fancy. Too many gravelled alleys offend the eye, especially if they be much twisted or run across; as it comprehends the whole at once. Their breadths should be proportioned to that of the beds; nor should they be much sunk; seldom more than an inch; otherwise they have a bad effect, and look rather like furrows than alleys. They may be edged with box, with daisies, with violets, gentianella, or thrift, according to fancy. But the edging, whatever it be, should be kept low, thin, and neat. It should seldom be allowed to rise two inches high, or spread two inches wide. A linear box-edging always pleases, if kept quite close and connected."

The author of the "Florist's Manual," though she confines her directions to one style, has much more correct ideas on the subject than our practical authors. "It is more difficult," she says, "than may at first appear, to plan, even upon a small scale, such a piece of ground, nor, perhaps, would any but an experienced scientific eye be aware of the difficulties to be encountered in the disposal of a few shaped borders interspersed with turf; the nicety consists in arranging the different parts so as to form a connected glow of color, to effect which, it will be necessary to place the borders in such a manner that, when viewed from the windows of the house, or from the principal entrance into the garden, one border shall not intercept the beauties of another, nor, in avoiding that error, produce one still greater, that of vacancies betwixt the borders, forming small avenues, by which the whole is separated into broken parts, and the general effect lost. Another point to be attended to is the just proportion of green turf, which, without nice observation, will be too much or too little for the color with which it is blended; and, lastly, the breadth of the flower-borders should not be greater than what will place the roots within reach of the gardener's arm without the necessity of treading upon the soil, the mark of footsteps being a deformity wherever it appears amongst flowers."

The materials which form the surface of flower-gardens (Figs. 2, 3, and 4) are gravel (a), turf (b), and dug borders (c), patches (d), or compartments (e), and water (f); but a variety of other objects and materials may be introduced as receptacles for plants, or on the surfaces of walks; as grotesque roots, rocks, flints, spar, shells, scorie in conglomerated lumps, sand and gravel of different colors; besides works of art introduced as decorations, such as baskets, vases, boxes, &c., of plain or rustic work; or tonelle performances, when the old French style is imitated.

Rockworks. The author of the "Florist's Manual" observes, on this subject, that "fragments of stone may be made use of, planted with such roots as flourish among rocks, and to which it might not be difficult to give a natural appearance, by suiting the kind of stone to the plant which grows naturally among its débris. The present fashion of introducing into flower-gardens this kind of rockwork requires the hand of taste to assimilate it to our flower-borders, the massive fabric of the rock being liable to render the lighter assemblage of the borders diminutive and meagre: on this point caution only can be given, the execution must be left to the elegant eye of taste, which, thus warned, will quickly perceive such deformity. We must venture to disapprove of the extended manner in which this mixture of stones and plants is sometimes introduced, not having been able to reconcile our eye, even in gardens planned and cultivated with every advantage which elegant ingenuity can give them, to the unnatural appearance of artificial crags of rock and other stones interspersed with delicate plants, to the culture of which the fertile and sheltered border is evidently necessary, being decided that nothing of the kind should be admitted into the simple parterre that is not manifestly of use to the growth of some of the species therein exhibited. In pleasure-grounds or flower-gardens on an extensive scale, where we meet with fountains and statuary, the greater kinds of garden rockwork might probably be well introduced; but to such a magnificent display of art we feel our taste and knowledge wholly incompetent." "Where neither expense nor trouble," the same author adds, "opposes their prohibitory barrier, many of the vegetable tribe may be cultivated to greater perfection, if we appropriate different gardens to the growth of different species; as, although it is essential to the completion of our garden to introduce, on account of their scent and beauty, some of the more hardy species of the flowers termed annuals, in that situation room cannot be afforded them sufficient to their production in that full luxuriance which they will exhibit when not crowded and overshadowed by herbaceous vegetables; and hence becomes desirable that which may be called the annual flower-garden, into which no other kind of flower is admitted besides that fugacious order, and under which is contained so great a variety of beauty and elegance, as one well calculated to form a garden, vying in brilliancy with the finest collection of hardy perennials. Also, the plants comprised under the bulbous division of vegetables, although equally essential to the perfection of the mingled flower-garden, lose much of their peculiar beauty when not cultivated by themselves, and will well repay the trouble of an assiduous care to give to each species the soil and aspect best suited to its nature. Two kinds of garden may be formed from the extensive and beautiful variety of bulbous-rooted flowers; the first, wherein they should be planted in distinct compartments, each kind having a border appropriated to itself, thus forming, in the Eastern taste, not only the 'garden of hyacinths,' but a garden of each species of bulb which is capable of being brought to perfection without the fostering shelter of a conservatory. The second bulbous garden might be formed from a collection of the almost infinite variety of this lovely tribe, the intermixture of which might produce the most beautiful effect, and a succession of bloom to continue throughout the early months of summer. A similar extension of pleasure might be derived from a similar division of all kinds of flowers, and here the taste for borders planted with distinct tribes may be properly exercised, and, as most of the kinds of bulbs best suited to this disposition have finished their bloom before the usual time at which annuals disclose their beauties, the annual and the bulbous gardens might be so united that, at the period when the bloom of the latter has disappeared, the opening buds of the former might supply its place, and continue the gayety of the borders."

The greenhouse or conservatory is generally placed in the flower-garden, provided these structures are not appended to the house. In laying out the area, a fit situation must be allotted for this department of floriculture, and the principles of guidance laid down in treating of the situation of the culinary hothouses require here also to be applied. Some recommend the distribution of the botanic hothouses throughout the flower-garden or pleasure-ground; but we are decidedly of opinion that much the best effect is produced when they are connected together in one scene. By the other mode they may form objects agreeable enough to look at externally; but, to derive the full effect of their internal beauties, it appears to us that they must be examined in succession and without interruption. No arrangement can be better, in our opinion, than to connect the whole of the botanic hothouses with the mansion as an introductory scene to the flower-garden.

According to Neill, a greenhouse, conservatory, and stove should form prominent objects in the different parts of the flower-garden. The author of the "Florist's Manual" recommends a spring-conservatory, annexed to the house, consisting of borders sheltered by glass, and heated only to the degree that will produce a temperature under which all the flowers that would naturally bloom betwixt the months of February and May might be collected, and thence be enabled to expand their beauties with vigor.

According to Nicol, "the most proper situation for the greenhouse and conservatory, in an extensive and well laid out place, is certainly in the shrubbery or flower-garden; and not, as they are very generally to be found, in the kitchen-garden, combined with the forcing-houses. In smaller places, no doubt, they must be situated so as to suit other conveniences; and we often find them connected with the dwelling-house. In this latter way they may be very convenient, especially in the winter season, and may answer for keeping many of the hardy kinds of exotics; but it is seldom they can be so placed and constructed, on account of their connection with the building, as to suit the culture of the finer sorts, and bring them to a flowering state. Such may rather be termed green-rooms, as being connected with the house."

Abercrombie says: "A greenhouse may be made a very ornamental object as a structure: its situation is, therefore, usually in a conspicuous part of the pleasure-ground, contiguous to the family residence. The front of the building should stand directly to the south, and the ends have an open aspect to the east and west."

Flower-nursery, and pits for forcing flowers. To every complete flower-garden and shrubbery, a piece of ground should be set apart in a convenient and concealed situation, as a reserve-ground, or nursery of flowering plants and shrubs. The situation should, if practicable, be behind and near to the range of hothouses, and it may, at the same time, include the pits for forcing flowers, and the hotbed department of the flower-garden. Here plants may be originated from seed, cuttings, pipings, and a proper stock kept up, partly in beds, and partly in pots, for more easy removal, to supply blanks, and, in the more select scenes, to replace such as have done flowering. No flower-garden can be kept in complete order without a nursery of this description; nor could the management of some sorts of florists' flowers, as the auricula, during the latter part of summer and winter, the carnation, &c., be well carried on without it. Here they may be grown, and, when in bloom, exhibited in proper stages in the main garden.

Walks. In most styles of parterres, these are formed of gravel; but, in the modern sort, which consist of turf, varied by wavy dug beds, and surrounded by shrubbery, they are sometimes dispensed with. Such a flower-garden is recommended by the author of the "Florist's Manual," as suitable for the "midst of pleasure-ground," and the beds "peculiarly adapted to the advantageous exhibition of flowers." The general length of the beds she recommends to be "from twenty-three to twenty-five feet, and the width, in the broadest part, about four feet; the grass to be five or six feet wide between the beds, that it may be conveniently mown and rolled: all the beds a good deal raised."

In extensive and irregular parterres, one gravel-walk, accompanied by broad margins of turf, to serve as walks for such as prefer that material, should be so contrived as to form a tour for the display of the whole garden. There should also be other secondary interesting walks of the same width, of gravel, and smaller walks for displaying particular details. The main walk, however, ought to be easily distinguishable from the others by its broad margins of fine turf. In general, the gravel is of uniform breadth throughout the whole length of the walk; but in that sort of French parterres which they call parterres of embroidery (Fig. 4), the breadth of the gravelled part (a) varies like that of the turf. Such figures, when correctly executed, carefully planted, judiciously intermixed with basket-work, shells, party-colored gravels, &c., and kept in perfect order, are highly ornamental; but very few gardeners enter into the spirit of this department of their art. The French and Dutch have long greatly excelled us in the formation of small gardens and the display of flowers; and whoever wishes to succeed in this department ought to visit Amsterdam, Antwerp, Brussels, and Paris; and consult the old French works of Mallet, Boyceau, Le Blond, D'Argenville, &c.

Edgings. In parterres where turf is not used as a ground or basis out of which to cut the beds and walks, the gravel of the latter is disparted from the dug ground of the former by edgings or rows of low-growing plants, as in the kitchen-garden. Various plants have been used for this purpose; but, as Neill observes, the best for extensive use is the dwarfish Dutch box, kept low, and free from blanks. Abercrombie says: "Thrift is the neatest evergreen, next to box. In other parts, the daisy, pink, London-pride, primrose, violet, gentian, and periwinkle may be employed as edgings. Lastly, the limits between the gravel-walks and the dug-work may sometimes be marked by running verges of grass, kept close and neat. Whatever edgings are employed, they should be formed previous to laying the gravel."

Basket-edgings. Small groups near the eye, and whether on grass or gravel, may be very neatly inclosed by a worked fence of basket-willows from six inches to one foot high. These wickerwork frames may be used with or without verdant edgings; they give a finished and an enriched appearance to highly-polished scenery; enhance the value of what is within, and help to keep off small dogs, children, &c. Abercrombie scarcely approves of them. He says: "Where round or oval parterres stand on a ground of lawn, it is a prevailing fashion to surround them with what are termed baskets. These are commonly made either of wood or cast-iron; those of the latter material, of course, are durable; and the others, if painted, and removed under shelter in winter, will last ten or twelve years."

We present a few more forms of rustic fences, made in the manner described in our August number.

THE DEAD DOVE.

BY FLORENCE MACDONALD.

"It is only a bird, Ada," said the young lover of the gentle girl; "why should you grieve over its death?"

"If the song sparrow had died, or the little wren, or even the robin," replied Ada, sadly, "my heart would not have felt the pain that now oppresses it; but to look upon a dead dove touches my feelings deeply."

"But why should you feel more pain because a dove has died? Its life is the same as the life of a robin, a sparrow, or a wren."

"No, not the same, Henry."

"Wherein lies the difference?"

"Are not their bodies different?"

"Oh yes."

"It is because their lives are different that their bodies vary in appearance: each is a form of affection; the sparrow of one affection, and the dove of another. And this is the reason why, in looking upon one, we are affected differently from what we are when we look at another."

"A strange doctrine, Ada, is it not?"

"Oh no. What makes the wolf differ from the lamb? Is it not his affection, of which his body is the repulsive form? The wolf is embodied cruelty, and the lamb is embodied innocence. And how good is our all-wise and merciful Creator in thus placing before our eyes, in this world, embodied affections, that we may the more fully understand their evil or good qualities! When we look upon a cruel beast, we have a more perfect idea of the direful nature of those affections in our hearts which originate in self-love; and when we look at an innocent lamb, or a gentle dove, we perceive the beauty of good affections."

"Yours is a beautiful theory, Ada; and, if true, how full of life! With what new eyes would I look around me on the visible forms of nature, if I could believe as you believe."

"I cannot believe otherwise," said Ada, as she lifted her eyes from the bird in her hand, and looked tenderly at her lover.

"And this dove—to what affection does it correspond, and why are you so deeply touched by its death?"

"Need you ask, Henry? Is it not the embodied form of a pure, confiding love—such love as only a woman's heart can feel? And do you wonder that I am pained to see the death of such a love? Can I help thinking of woman's trusting heart betrayed? of affection trampled out under the foot of neglect and wrong?" And tears came into the eyes of the pure-hearted girl.

"Dear Ada!" said the young man, earnestly, "why will you let such painful thoughts come into your mind? They have no business there: your heart will never know betrayal; your affection will never be trampled out under the crushing foot of neglect."

"I did not think of myself," returned Ada, quickly; "I thought only of others."

The young man pressed his lips to hers, and then their eyes drooped from each other's, and rested upon the form of the dead dove.

"Never shall her heart feel the pangs of neglect; never, no, never!" said the lover, in earnest self-communion.

May his words prove a true prophecy: and if, in after life, his heart swerve, even for an instant, from its affection, may the form of the dead dove present itself, and warn him of the ruin his infidelity would occasion!

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN IN CITIES.

NO. III.—SHOPKEEPING.

BY ALICE B. WHAL.

We are apt to consider it something of an affection, when we hear a lady denounce shopping as "a bore."

One may dislike trouble of any kind, but, when the exertion is made, and the keen pursuit commences, the patterns begin to gather in the hand, and the parcels to accumulate on the counter, it is not in the feminine heart to say that "this is a disagreeable occupation." Like any other talent, and like all accomplishments, "shopping" is to be cultivated; nay, the whole thing has been reduced to a science, and we have ladies on our list of acquaintances that might readily become professors, enlivening their lectures by many choice bits of experience, and the result of long and careful observation.

And so we will imagine, by way of passing a pleasant morning, that one of these indefatigable ladies has invited us to accompany her on a shopping expedition; for you, dear ladies, are strangers in Philadelphia, and as for us, we are supposed, by virtue of our habitual pen and ink pursuits, to know very little of "the poms and vanities." Therefore we place ourselves, in all humility, under the conduct of the brisk little lady, who, armed by parasol, purse, and a list of corresponding length, is about to commence her "fall shopping."

I always commence in good season," Mrs. Jenkins prattles forth; "for the people have more time to attend to you; and when I shop, I shop."

Emphatic Mrs. Jenkins! you are certain that she speaks "words of truth and soberness," by the way she goes over her list, arranging the miscellaneous items under their proper heads, as the carriage drives down towards the business part of the town. Her own wardrobe and the nursery come under one item; the store and linen closets form another; a seamstress is to be looked up; an opening of millinery to be attended. You look on in dismay, wondering how all this is to be accomplished: it might prove more than a day's work to one less experienced than our guide. Now her hand is on the check-string, her list and pencil in the other; she has arranged the "line of march."

"John, you may drive to Tyndale's first, then to Levy's. From Levy's we will go to Second Street," she says, turning to us with the same business-like air; "from there to Eighth; then up to Tenth, for some plain work; and, by that time, you will want a luncheon."

We think we shall. The prospect is fatiguing enough to make the conclusion a pleasant anticipation.

You have just paid your first visit to New York, coming from there to our quieter city, and have been introduced to the wonders of Stewart's marble palace, and the elegances of Beck's; you remember the smiles, and bows, and politeness of the perfumed and bewhiskered young gentlemen who unfolded the muslins, and rolled up the ribbons, and sorted the gloves for you. Did it not strike you as an exceedingly noble and manly employment, so befitting masculine strength and energy?—one that a woman could never have the quickness, or grace, or taste to fill?—that it was therefore given up to the sterner sex, who had adapted themselves so harmoniously to what was evidently intended by Providence as their sphere? We are sure it must have forced itself upon your consideration.

But we are at Tyndale's. You have heard of the establishment before; for it has even a European reputation for the exquisite taste in the selection and arrangement of the glass and china with which it is filled. And yet a woman founded this reputation by her energy, her tact, and industry; a woman planned the elegant hall, with its artistic arrangements, and gathered together the large capital necessary to its construction, and the scale of the business conducted here; where, instead of being received by a careless or obsequious clerk, a young girl comes forward, as a lady would receive in her own parlor, to know our commands. There are others behind the long counters arranging the vases that have just arrived in the steamer, or comparing the patterns of glass, or showing a new dinner-set to some favorite customer. It is a novelty to you, and you look to see how a woman in so exposed a position bears herself. With the strictest propriety and grace; for she has been here a long time, and knows exactly what will suit her customers: that one must be talked into purchasing, and another sale might be spoiled by a word of comment. She has grown to be a physiognomist, and can tell in a moment that the lady in the flounced barège wishes some pattern for her dinner-table that will attract notice by the variety and brilliancy of the coloring. That exquisite Sevres set, with a different mythological design on each of the three hundred pieces, would be entirely lost on her; although that plainly dressed woman who came in last understands the value of every plate, the classical beauty of even the sauce-boats in shape and ornament. Our lady of the flounces chooses the heaviest glass, of the most elaborate pattern; the face of the other lights up with admiration at the pure crystal water-goblet, so thin that a touch would almost shiver it, the graceful stem rising as if to hold the cup of a flower. And the attendant knows this at once, and thus saves herself and her customer time and patience. Yet this tact is essentially a feminine quality, cultivated by patient observation and a long experience.

"Save the bookkeepers, perched upon their high stools, and the proprietors of the establishment, there seem to be only women in attendance," you say, as we resume our seats in the carriage, while Mrs. Jenkins "hands in" the tumblers she has matched, the fruit-dish she has coveted so long for her dessert-service, and a tea-set in miniature for the nursery doll-house.

"Oh no," she returns. "I suppose it seemed strange to you; but I never think of it, except to say how nice it is. I am always in a fever when I see a man handling china; men are so awkward! A waiter man will break twice as much in a year as a girl, if you ever noticed it.—(No, not there, boy; put those plates on to the front seat—here, by me. Now hand up the rest.)—As I was saying, girls handle things so much more carefully—(Levy's, John)—and then I hate to have a man following me about the store, as if I didn't know what I wanted to see. A woman knows when to hold her tongue sometimes; but, if a man talks at all, he talks you to death, and, if not, he's so sulky that you hate to ask him to show you anything."

"That's just what I should feel in being waited on by women," you modestly suggest. "I don't like to have one of my own sex feel as if they were inferior to me, especially such ladylike-looking girls. I never saw women who seemed better bred, not even in visiting."

"And so it is"—for our active little lady seems to have had a large share of good sense and right feeling—"they are well bred; and so you see none of that cringing servility I so hate in a shopman, or the rudeness that is equally disagreeable. Such a woman never could feel herself your inferior, when she is quietly attending to her business to the best of her capacity; nor is she, my dear madam."

"I grant the latter, and own it troubled me to see such ladylike-looking girls exposed to such public observation, and perhaps impertinence. It does not seem to me a woman's place to come so in open contact with all kinds of people"—for you have been brought up carefully in the seclusion of home yourself, and are thoroughly opposed to female president-making, or having ships of the line called "Women-of-war," as some of your sex will doubtless soon petition.

"It would seem so, perhaps," Mrs. Jenkins answers, thoughtfully, consulting her list to see what comes next in order. "But think of it for a moment. What woman ever trifles with a shopman, or allows him to bandy words with her? The same dignity of character can be, and is preserved by our shopwomen; for, in Philadelphia, more than half our stores are managed by them. Some are very beautiful, too, and as well dressed as you or I. Wait till we get to Levy's, and all along from there up to Tenth and Chestnut, in every fashionable shop. They have an opportunity to purchase their dress cheaply, and time and good taste to make it up. Besides, they are in the very centre of fashion, and it would be strange if they did not avail themselves of it."

And this reminds us of a Southern gentleman introduced to us in travelling last summer. "Madam," he said, "Philadelphia is a beautiful place. You have some of the prettiest women there I ever saw. In your shops, I mean. I went into one, as I came on, to buy a pair of gloves; there was a splendid creature behind the counter, a perfect Juno! Such teeth! such eyes! such a figure! I'd give anything to see her on my horse Archer! She wouldn't be afraid of anything, I venture to say. I felt as if I was insulting her when I asked the price of these gloves. I felt much more like offering her my hand and heart than the gold piece I gave for them. I did not wait for change: the idea of four-pences counted out by such a creature!"

"Your friend was an enthusiast," Mrs. Jenkins says, smiling. "There is a great deal of the romance of shopkeeping, no doubt, if we only knew it, enough for a two-volume novel. It was only last winter that the head of one of our best firms married one of the young ladies who had been in the store several years. She was of a very good family, reduced in circumstances, and thus restored to comfort and affluence again; nor is this a solitary instance. But here is Levy's."

As you are well aware, this is our Stewart's, save that there is less display. The habitual customers are, as at Tyndale's, among our most fashionable people, and, of course, those who desire to be so considered are always to be seen thronging the counters. Many a woman has helped herself into Uppertendom through her purchases, and the accidental associations of Levy's and Miss Wharton's; and many another of greater pretensions has only confirmed her vulgarity by her lavish and ill-judged expenditure. It is here she has received the keenest slights from persons she would give her last new bracelet to bow to; here she has incurred the never-ending displeasure of the fashionable Mrs. Jones or Thompson, by ordering a dress from the same piece, and having it made from the same pattern, while Mrs. Jones is tall and thin, and her copyist is short and rosy. But it was the demure-looking girl behind the counter who told her of Mrs. Jones's purchase, to confirm her wavering fancy; for she, shrewd looker-on in Vienna, knew the instant effect such information would produce.

She and her friend at the next counter are well aware of the unsuccessful struggles Mrs. McAdo persists in. She saw Mrs. Jones turn her back upon the approach, and the chillingly-distant stare with which Mrs. Thompson resigned to her the silk on which her ill-breeding laid violent hands. She knows that the Thompsons are living beyond their means, and that a crash is inevitable; but that is not her affair, so long as Mrs. Thompson trims her caps with Honiton lace at five dollars a yard, and she is instructed to trust her. But think you that, for all their fine dresses and fine furniture, she would change places with either of them? No; she has taken far-reaching views into the social world from her station at Levy's counter. She knows the real value of the costly goods passing through her hands, and that she folds the rich cashmere shawl for her customers over many an aching heart, and tempts in vain a drooping spirit with those rich laces. Care, and passion, and sorrow visit the proudest homes, and hers is bright and happy, and she feels that her own industry and self-denial have helped to make it so, and that love and contentment are not to be purchased with "gold that perisheth." Ah no, the cringing, fawning neophyte, the careworn woman of fashion, might well envy her womanly independence of spirit, and the strength of her character.

Hers is a pleasant and varied employment. There is no stagnation of thought or compression of the frame. All occupations have their disadvantages, and their own share of weariness; but hers has constantly changing interest, new faces, new traits of character, never-ending incident. And here, more especially, the departments are so divided that the actual labor is very light. The book of patterns retained on the counter saves many a wearisome folding and unfolding; and, being appointed to one style of goods, she necessarily understands exactly what is required of her. In the dull season, there is plenty of time for chat; and vacations of a day, or a week, are at her own discretion. There is many a bright and agreeable face in the twenty or thirty girls who line the long counters, aided, as Mrs. Jenkins had before suggested, by neat and tasteful dress.

"And what is the salary?" you inquire, as we leave the store, partially converted to the new "nation of shopkeepers." "Can they afford to look as nicely as they do? or are they obliged to spend all their earnings in keeping up appearances?"

"I asked once myself," replies our friend, busily bestowing packages, so that they may not be polking backwards and forwards with the motion of the carriage. "None of them receive under four dollars a week, and some have seven or eight, according to their experience or real usefulness. I can remember some of the faces at Levy's for years, and, of course, they must be well paid. Now confess that you don't see anything in the least unwomanly in the occupation; though I don't go quite so far as Mr. —, who dined with us last Thursday. He has looked into these matters considerably, and proposes a petition for a law to send all men who are found behind a counter of dry-goods to the penitentiary! Though I declare it would be a good thing to go in force all over the country, until they bestirred themselves to find other things for women to do. There wouldn't be half the want, or sin either, in the world, if there was a wider scope for the employment of active, intelligent females.

"For," she continues, quite entering into the spirit of the subject, "just see how many young girls are growing up dependent on their brothers or fathers, and wasting their own time, or making foolish, unhappy matches, when they might much better be usefully employed. And look at the widows, worn down by dependence and grudging charity, seeing their children neglected or ill used, when their hearts are aching to do something for themselves, and to make a home for these helpless little ones. If I was a widow, I'd soon find something to do, you may depend."

"But you could teach."

"Not in Philadelphia, where there are more boarding-schools now than can get supported. Many a poor soul is struggling on in difficulties and embarrassments who would be glad to work with her hands, if she could only find something to do, and I guess it's so all over."

"But there is always plain sewing," you suggest, readily.

"Do you know what women get for plain sewing?" Mrs. Jenkins abruptly asks; "because I have had occasion to know something about that, too. I can give you, almost word for word, the answer of a dealer in wholesale clothing, who had been twenty years in the business. I went accidentally to his shop to make an inquiry, and it occurred to me to ask if he could give employment to some poor woman I was just then interested in.

"We give the highest prices, ma'am, and calculate to have all our work well done. Now we have given as high as eighty-seven cents a piece for fine shirts."

"Eighty-seven cents! Why, I always pay a dollar and a quarter."

"Oh, we couldn't stand that no way, ma'am. It wouldn't pay at all. Why, in these cheap clothing stores, none of 'em give over a levy and three fips, and ten cents for Canton flannel. We don't pay a great deal on that; but these are mostly made by old women, who can't see so very well, and don't depend on it for a living, so they can afford to work cheap."

"But a woman who does depend on her needle, how much can she make?"

"Why, a right steady hand can earn as high as two, and two and a half, and three dollars, by sitting to it all the time. A vest-maker can do that, if she's good at button-holes. You see, I just cut out half a dozen satin vests at once, and give them. A pantaloons-maker can't do so well, unless she has customer-work, or is uncommonly smart. Some don't make over a dollar, or a dollar and a half, if they don't bring in good work. You see, they don't stay long enough at their trade to learn. They can't afford to pay their board, and so they don't stay more than three months before they must begin to earn for themselves. That makes a great many bad hands. I pity the poor things, and get along with them the best I can. Sometimes I try to show them myself; but I have to turn them off at last; though, I must say, it goes rather hard," said the worthy man, "because I know half the time they haven't got money to pay their board, and dear knows what becomes of them! And those that do well, you see, they have to sit so steady to make their three dollars, and then their board has to come out of that, and they don't have much light or good air, and they mostly get sick, and just live along."

"That's almost word for word what he told me, and, I declare, it gave me such a heartache I could not enjoy my own comfort. He was, no doubt, a liberal and humane employer. Think how many are a great deal worse off. I've no patience with people who are everlastingly preaching up the needle. If the sword has its thousand victims, the needle has its ten thousands, small and inoffensive as it seems, because we women know how intolerably irksome the unvaried labor must be. I like sewing, and should not know what to do with myself often without it; but to sew only one morning without stopping always gives me a pain in my side."

We all can certainly testify to the truth of this.

"Some of my Sunday-school girls," continues the good woman, whom we have never before suspected of knowing anything more of social economy than appertained to the management of her own household, "when I used to teach—that was the first I ever thought about the matter: they were quite large girls: I had a kind of Bible class; and nearly all earned their own living. It was very easy for me to go round in my silk dress and white kid gloves, and preach up self-denial and industry to them, out of our Sunday's lesson, and they practising it all the time, in those little dark filthy alleys, swarming with pigs and children. One of them sewed straw bonnets;—no wonder they can sell them so cheap, when they only give ten cents apiece for them!—others worked in crowded milliner shops from Monday morning till Saturday night, for a dollar and a half, mixing with good and bad—the Monday's talk with their comrades undoing all the good of Sunday's lessons. I soon found that out. A young girl could hardly have a worse moral atmosphere than one of those work-rooms; they themselves, and their mothers, have told me so many a time. I always had a heart-ache while I taught those girls: it was the first thing that made me think of what a woman ought to be, or might be, in the way of influencing society—her own sex in particular—without any public gatherings, or speech-makings either."

Mrs. Jenkins has certainly spoken very energetically in all those intervals of our shopping in Second street, where we have still been waited upon by our own sex as well as though the hands that displayed the ribbons and muslins had been twice as large and coarse; and now we are driven to Eighth Street, to be fitted for a pair of gaiters—still by a woman—and here the comfort and propriety are self-evident; there is no need of soiling your own gloves, or ruffling your temper in bending over a refractory lacing.

Eighth Street is the paradise of cheap shopping, as we all know; but it is remarkable for one other feature: so many of these little stores are not only kept, but owned by women, many of whom have accumulated a sufficient sum to retire upon comfortably, when they shall choose. This we are told from the lips of one of them, a bright, tidy little body, who shakes back her black curls, and snips a little bit of paper with her scissors as she talks.

"You have been here some time, Mrs. White," says Mrs. Jenkins, choosing a sague for her youngest boy.

"Yes, ma'am; eight years now. I came when there were very few stores along in this square, and I have made my own business, as you may say, and a great deal for other people. I've been a widow now fifteen years," (she scarcely looks old enough for this, so round, so comely are her face and figure,) "and I was left without anything; and now I've got enough to live on the rest of my days, if I choose; but I know I couldn't be satisfied to sit still, after such an active life. I bought my goods myself, and sewed, and 'tended the shop, and saved, and I knew all I was making was for myself. My rent was always ready when rent-day came, and I never had to ask the favor of security from anybody, though this house and store is seven hundred a year. Please God, I'm quite independent now." And yet withal she is as womanly a little body as one could wish to see.

But we must not neglect to sketch the three sisters that we find next door, dispensing their pins and tapes, and polite sayings over their little counter. Mrs. Jenkins commends them to our especial notice; but this is not necessary, we have made their acquaintance before. They are always dressed precisely alike, it seems to us, in subdued half mourning black dresses and lead-colored ribbons, and each with a mourning brooch, their only ornament. We cannot tell them apart yet, although it is three years since we first chanced to notice the neat shop windows, with their collars and cuffs, and ribbons, and such beautifully shaped combs and brushes. They are all tall, with full fine figures, appear to be the same age, or certainly very near it. They have kindly dark eyes, and black hair neatly arranged, and speak in a soft, measured voice; they seem to have one voice as well as one mind. Many an errand we have made there, for a moment's glance at so much quiet goodness and content.

"Pins, Miss?" Perhaps our feminine vanity is conciliated by this, for they have never recognised our claim to the dignity of madamship. "Which sort, if you please? Oh, English pins; quite small, I recollect; they do not tear one's collars so, and though they cost a little more, are better in the end. Lovely day, Miss; quite cool after the shower yesterday. Yes, ten cents for those; this size are a levy. Was there anything else? Combs? I suppose you would like them well finished. Sister, will you be so good as to show this young lady some tucking combs? At the other counter, Miss;" and we turn to the other counter to find the ditto of the first speaker, in appearance, voice, and manner.

"Wore your last comb two years? That's the fault of our goods, though," (with a low mellow laugh;) "all our customers say so; they last too long for our profit. But then we always have the best, as you say the best is the cheapest in the end. Yes, Miss, that's a beautiful pattern; we had a great deal of trouble to get it again. The street is quite lively this morning. A great many people are out of town though. This one, did you say? Eighty-seven cents, if you please. We would just as soon change a five dollar piece as not. Thank you, Miss; sometimes we have a heavy payment to make, and it is all the better. This is the change, I believe; all but five cents. I'm sorry to keep you waiting. Sister, could you give this young lady five cents? Good morning; good morning, Miss." And both sisters bow and smile as pleasantly as if we had expended ten dollars instead of one.

We have often longed to know something of their history, there is such an air of placid content and innate refinement about them and their little shop; their very ribbons rustle, with an old-style gentility, as they are folded and unfolded in their soft white hands.

And now the carriage rolls beyond what we have always considered the business part of the town, down Tenth Street, to a range of low frame houses, each with its narrow window of cheap muslins, and tawdry ornaments; shops, as the author of the "Charcoal Sketches" has said, "which bring a sensation of dreariness over the mind, and which cause a sinking of the heart, before you have time to ask why you are saddened; frail and feeble barriers they seem against penury and famine, to yield at the first approach of the gaunt enemy. Look at one of them closely. There is no aspect of business about it; it compels you to think of distracting for rent, of broken hearts, of sickness, suffering, and death.

"It is a shop, moreover, we have all seen the like, with a bell to it, which rings out an announcement as we open the door, that few and far between there has been an arrival in the way of a customer, though it may be that the bell, with all its untuned sharpness, fails to triumph over the din of domestic affairs in the little dark room, that serves for parlor, and kitchen, and hall, and proves unavailing to spread the news against the turbulent clamor of noisy children. The owner is one of those women you may recognize in the street by their look of premature age, anxious, hollow-eyed, and worn to shadows. There is a whole history in every line of their faces, which tells of unceasing trouble; and their hard quick movement, as they press onward, regardless of all that begets their way, indicates those who have no thoughts to spare, from their own immediate necessities, for comment on the gay flaunting world. Little does ostentation know, as it flashes by in satiated arrogance and jeweled pride, of the sorrow it may jostle from its path; and perhaps it is happy for us, as we move along in smiles and pleasantries, not to comprehend that the glance which meets our own comes from the bleakness of a withered heart, withered by penury's unceasing presence."

Ay, it is too true a picture to spare one tint, one shade of the sombre coloring, for such is the worn face that tries to smile—such a wintry gleam!—as we are welcomed, though there is scarcely room to stand, outside the narrow empty counter. And why has industry failed in its reward? "It is those fairs," the woman tells us—speaking bitterly, poor soul! and what wonder?—"that kills all our business. Some ladies won't pay a fair price when they can get things there so much less, and even think they are giving to charity besides. It's poor charity, to my thinking, ma'am, that takes the bread out of our mouths, and works our hands to the bone. And then they come here, and bring their work, and we must do it for next to nothing, because we can't starve, and they know it. Some ladies don't seem to have no conscience, ma'am."

But Mrs. Jenkins is not of these; she has come far out of her way to give out this bundle of plain sewing, and she will pay a fair price for it, too. "I know it won't be done quite so well," she says to us confidentially, "but it will wear quite as long, and nobody will look at the stitches. That poor soul used to sew beautifully when she was first a widow, but she set up a little shop for muslins and trimmings, as you see, and sunk all she had, because ladies will buy where they can get things under price, without looking at the justice of the thing. Now she has to slight her work; but I never say a word. I see just how things go."

Reader, thus far we have spoken under the guise of a pleasant morning's talk; but we have given you no fancy sketches. What we have related are studies in a life school, vouched for by our own actual experience and observation; and yet the task we have set for ourselves seems so feebly executed that we could almost lay down our pen despairingly, when we think of the hundreds of our own sex, everywhere around us, wasting life and energy in idleness, or ill-paid and wasting labor. And we have our own share in the wrong—those of us, at least, who allow the weakness or poverty of our sisters to minister to our own luxury and selfishness. "The laborer is not unworthy of her hire;" and when, by trifling self-denial of ostentatious luxuries, the needlewoman has her just and equitable recompense, hers will cease to be the wearisome and dreaded task it has now become. But this cannot be, so long as it is the only avenue open to our sex. It is a principle of our social economy that the price shall be equal to the demand; and where so many are forced into competition, justice cannot be rendered. But we have said what we could, with deep and earnest feeling, and must leave, for a time, a subject so full of interest to us all, believing, with Frederika Bremer, that—

"He who points out a new field for the employment of female industry ought to be regarded as a public benefactor; and any means by which such a field becomes accessible to woman recommends itself to society as an important agent in the civilization of the future."

INFLUENCE OF EXTERNAL NATURE ON MAN.

BY J. J. BAKER.

In casting our eyes over the earth, our attention is first arrested by the great variety of scenery, and the different degrees of fertility that characterize its surface. The contrasts are remarkable and striking. In the polar regions, we have an aspect of perpetual desolation; while, in tropical countries, sunshine and verdure everywhere greet our eyes. The poet of the "Seasons" thus describes the former regions—

"For relentless months, continual night
Holds o'er the glittering waste her starry reign.
There, through the prison of unbounded wilds,
Barred by the hand of Nature from escape,
Wilde roams the Russian exile. Naught around
Strikes his sad eye but deserts lost in snow,
And heavy loaded groves; and solid floods
That stretch athwart the solitary waste,
Their icy horrors to the frozen main."

Such is a truthful and beautiful description of those regions of the earth roamed by the Laplander, the Siberian, the northern Russian, and Greenland.

Now let us turn to the shores of the Mediterranean, and the islands of the Grecian Archipelago, and refresh our vision among the scenes celebrated in classic verse. Here, the mantle of snow gives place to robes of green, decorated with Nature's most gorgeous colors; here, the rivers and brooks flow unfettered and free along their courses; here, all is radiant with light, where bird and beast find a congenial home, and mankind, sympathizing with the scenes around them, exult in universal happiness. The same contrasts may be observed in a single country, as in Switzerland, or in two contiguous countries, as in England and Scotland. In the former case, one part of the population live "embowered in vales where the happy Grisons dwell;" while another part "force the stubborn soil" of the mountain for bread: one part are shepherds reposing in the grateful climate of the valleys, while another part are clad in furs, and shod with snow-shoes, adapted to their cold, bleak, mountain home. Equally diversified are the scenes of the two contiguous countries referred to, but too familiar to need a description.

We may consider the various aspects of the earth as so many changes in the countenance of great Nature, with which we are affected as with the smiles and tears, joys and sorrows of a dear friend. In her mountains and hills, she assumes the pomp and majesty of a king, aweing us into silence and admiration; from the beetling cliff, rugged and barren in its aspect, she frowns upon us with the eye of a despot, sending a thrill of horror through all our frame; along the sunny vale, she assumes a sprightly air, her eyes beaming joy, and her face wrinkled with laughter; on the quiet lake, embowered among hills, a placid, serene smile sits upon her countenance, tranquillizing our thoughts and hushing our passions into peace. Again, we behold her in the heaving and swelling ocean, when the tempest goes forth upon its bosom, agitated, as it were, by some monster passion, foaming with rage and uttering a wrathful voice; and anon she sits on the desert, desolate and sad, with the dishevelled look, the weeping eye, and accent of woe.

These remarks have been made with a view to introduce the question as to how far human character is modified and moulded by the aspects of external nature. Without intending a full discussion of the subject, we shall produce a few illustrations showing this influence to be undoubtedly great. In reference to English character, a favorite poet thus writes:—

"They take, perhaps, a well-directed aim,
Who seek it in his climate and his frame.
Liberal in all things else, yet Nature here,
With stern severity, deals out the year.

Winter invades the Spring, and often pours
A chilling flood on Summer's drooping flowers;
Unwelcome vapors quench autumnal beams,
Un genial blasts attending curl the streams:
The peasants urge their harvests, ply the fork
With double toil, and shiver at their work:
Thus, with a vigor for his good designed,
She rears her favorite man of all mankind."

Though this is poetry, yet poetry utters a great many truths; and it is a very curious and suggestive fact that English climate and character so entirely coincide. John Bull is a blustering fellow, just like his winds, and, if his climate is fickle and sudden in its changes, so is he moody and his tempers uncertain. Are his winters frosty, and his summers genial? So are his likes and his dislikes, his loves and his hates; he has much winter and not a little sunshine mingled in his character.

Now, if we turn to France, we shall find a people of very different character, and an equally diverse climate. The atmosphere is soft and transparent, and the temperature uniform and genial. Every breeze is freighted with the odor of flowers, and every grove is vocal with the song of birds. Now, though we would not ascribe everything to climate, yet how strikingly do French manners coincide with the aspects of nature around them!

"The Frenchman, easy, debonair, and brisk,
Give him his lasso, his fiddle, and his frisk,
Is always happy, reign whoever may,
And laughs the sense of misery away."

In Italy, the same correspondences exist between the face of the country and the character of the people; for, though it be true that idleness and sensuality have debased the Italian character, and brought down its high aspirations, yet such is the magic of their sunny clime that, despite the most adverse moral influences, it still, chameleon-like, reflects the hues of the scenes amid which it is nursed.

We shall find a further confirmation of our idea by a reference to barbarous nations. The life of the poor Esquimaux is peculiarly dreary, rendered so as much by their modes of life as by their climate. Captain Parry says they are dull and gloomy, living together like swine in snow-houses and dark caves, and that they are scarcely ever seen to laugh or heard to joke. All the circumstances of their lives conduce to these results. A poet has embodied these ideas in the following beautiful lines:—

"Half enlivened by the distant sun,
That rears and ripens man, as well as plants,
Here, human nature wears its rudest form.
Deep from the piercing season sunk in caves,
Here, by dull fires, and with unjoyous cheer,
They waste the tedious gloom. Immersed in furs,
Dose the gross race. Nor sprightly jest nor song,
Nor tenderness they know; nor aught of life
Beyond the kindred bears that stalk without."

It may be said that the vices of these people have blunted their sensibilities, and rendered them brutal and dull. If we but turn our eyes to the islands of the Southern Pacific, we shall see a people more degraded, equally destitute of education, and, so far as we know, equally low in natural endowments. But do we find the same dullness, grossness, stupidity, and gloominess that characterize the Esquimaux? Here, the sun shines in all his glory, gilding the mountains and trees and waters with his radiance, and making the earth beautiful to look upon; here, flowers bloom, birds sing, and warm and soft breezes blow. Can man be gloomy here? Can he resist the spirit of gladness that breathes around? These islanders are expert and elegant dancers. Unlike their northern brethren, they rejoice in a rude music, and take pleasure in social assemblages and personal display. Dancing is generally regarded as an indication of hilarity, and of some degree of exhilaration of animal spirits, though, in promiscuous assemblies, certainly attended with a deterioration of manners; yet, so far as it is the expression of gayety in these islanders, it shows a correspondence between their climate and character. No such amusement obtains in rude climes and on inhospitable shores.

These observations might be extended to all the countries of the earth. Wherever extremes in climate and striking characteristics of natural scenery obtain, we are certain to find corresponding developments of character in the people. Certainly, the instances are not all equally striking or manifest, yet are we never without some signal proof of the facts in question. As before observed, we do not refer all the peculiarities of character that distinguish one nation from another to the influences of external nature; on the contrary, we believe that Nature lays the foundation of many of them, and some may be traced to the influences of other nations, to traditional and religious observances, and other causes.

If our facts and observations have established the proposition that the aspect of external nature exerts a very important influence in moulding the character of man, we think the fact itself cannot be devoid of interest as a matter of curious information, or barren of instruction in matters of higher moment. If it is the law of man's nature that he becomes assimilated to the things around him, it becomes important for him to bestow some attention upon the architecture of his dwellings and places of constant resort, and upon the aspect of their position and adornments. We know that this law of our nature has been taken advantage of in bygone ages to nurse the worst superstitions, and even now resort is had to the same measures for impressions to bolster up decaying systems of error.

The law of assimilation is peculiarly active in associations between moral and intelligent beings. We are told, in the Scriptures, that "we all with open face beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." What a glorious assimilation is this! With what gratitude should we reflect on the fact that God has given us natures susceptible of such glorious transformations, and capable of such high attainments in the scale of being!

Scripture exhortations to cheerfulness have a reference to the same law. "A sad countenance" seems to be the peculiar characteristic of the hypocrite, and is always a premonition of moral blight.

POETRY.

A SABBATH MORNING IN OCTOBER.

BY HENRY SETMOUR CHASE.

SEVERELY wakes the morn;
Her cloud-fringed eyelids glow with silver light,
From that bright orb they guard.

The azure depth
Of heaven's calm bosom holds one little cloud,
Star-lit, which feels the first warm kiss of Day,
And blushes. Then over the emerald hills,
With glory, flushes the ruddy light
From her soft-beaming eyes, and autumn woods,
Clothed in bright rainbow-dyes, in one sweet concord
Sing out a hymn to God.

Like maiden coy,
 wooing the glance of him she loves, the Quechee,
When she sees the Day King out his glowing Bath of beauty step, dripping with glory
O'er the pavement of the skies, doth gently
Cast aside her veil of mist, and murmurs
Back soft "Amen."

Mountain, plain, and glen,
Through night's cold tears of glistening dew, oft shed
For absent daylight, smile.

In grateful praise,
All Nature worships God.

This lofty mount,
Whose rugged bosom feels the power that
Thunders in the storm, and rocks the eagle
In her dizzy nest, and yonder fruitful
Hills, whose lowing herds enjoy the genial Sun, the universal concert join.

The
Wood-embosomed lake, whose calm blue eye, in
Its clear depth, reflects the fairy shores around,
Sends up its note of joy, and heavenly look
Of love.

Sweet-smelling herbs, and fragrant buds,
Pure incense offer, too. My rose, within
The casement, feels the inspiration of
The hour, and heavenward breathes its rich perfume.
Hushed is the sound of daily toll. Man goes
Not forth to-day, to sweat for cursed gain,
But to praise and pray.

Behold the Sabbath!
O sacred morn, that saw the rock-closed tomb
Where Jesus lay, by shining angels oped!
O blessed Christ! roll thou away the stone
From this cold heart, where lie entombed good Resolves. Breathe strength once more their stiffened joints Within, and bid them rise, come forth, and live.
The church-bells chime; to weary souls how sweet
The sounds harmonious. Through the bracing air
Their pleasant voices ring; invading, with Their call to prayer, each quiet nook and dell.

VOL. XLV.—33

Mount Tom, with joy, the merry peal receives
Amid its cavern'd rocks, and, dwelling there,
The fairy, echo, flings it gayly back
O'er distant hills.

The farmer's wife looks glad
When faintly falls upon her listening ear
The far-off worship-call.

Each humble cot,
And prouder mansion, send the op'ning buds
Of youth, the ripen'd fruit of manhood's prime,
And wither'd leaves of cane-supporting age,
To form an off'ring meet for God's own house
Of praise. In by-paths through the solemn woods—
Through meadows, dressed in autumn's later green—
Beside the brooks where truant school-boys rove—
And down the dusty road, they flocking come.
Around the church-door gathered, friendship grasps
Th' extended hand, and greets, in tones and smiles
Subdued, the motley throng around. This past,
With humble mien they walk the sacred aisles.
Bend low your heads and hearts, ye pious souls,
For God's own presence fills this sacred place,
And opens the narrow gate that leads to heaven.

With careful steps, across the village green,
See yonder couple take their customary way.
Each Sabbath morn, an aged mother, blind
With age, doth lean upon a gray-haired son's
Most willing arm. With love and duty strong Imbued, he leads where she may praise in God's Own temple. After "service," ere the hours
Of twilight pass, once more with cheerful steps
He goes, and reads to that old mother, blind
And poor, sweet words of truth and grace, from that Illumined page where Mercy pardon breathes
Through Jesus Christ our Lord.

O fragrant flowers
Of human hearts! there do ye meekly dwell,
And bless, with summer's bloom, the wintry soul
Of dying age.

THE SILENT MULTITUDE OF THE DEAD.

O MIGHTY city of the dead! what numerous hosts are here:
And yet all motionless they lie, unmoy'd by sorrow's tear.
Or by the mourner's wailing grief, who weeping stands above
This temple fill'd with pulseless hearts of lost and buried love.

Though gladsome rays of morning come to gild the hallowed spot,
Unnoticed all their glories shine; the sleepers heed them not:

Through radiant beams of noontide fall with clear, effulgent light,
Yet to that silent multitude 'tis one long dreamless night.

The evening sunshine kindly stays to throw its influence there,
And twilight's plying dews descend to weep the gentle tear;
That hour so full of holy thought, to sweet communion given,
When the spirits of the loved below commune with those in Heaven.

But beauty all of earth and air, of sky and boundless sea—
The glorious face that nature wears, all glad and bright and free—

Charm not the sleepers resting here, nor cause one throb of joy:

O Death, insatiate conqueror! thou 'rt mighty to destroy.

The husband here in calmness lies, and resting at his side
Is she, his heart's young chosen one, his fond and trusting bride:

He cares not that she there reclines in quiet by him now,
For Death's unfeeling touch has chilled that fair and polished brow.

The tender buds of hope and love, that came with morning's bloom,
The frosts of death have blighted now, and laid them in the tomb:

The lovely form of youth is here, the beautiful and pure—
Alas, thou mighty conqueror! thine aim is ever sure.

Here, all unmoved, the mother's heart lies pulseless, cold, and still;

That heart so constant, warm, and true—so firm through good and ill:

The dirging grief of stricken ones cannot avail them now,
Nor cause one ray of tenderness to light that pallid brow.

But oh! a new unclouded dawn, a glorious morn shall rise,
A morning of celestial birth—a herald from the skies—
When pealing through the trembling air the trumpet's sound shall come,

To wake the silent multitude that slumber in the tomb.

The wicked, ah! their fearful doom—no mighty One to save;

Far better to have slumbered on within the gloomy grave:
Not so the faithful and the good—with joy they 'll quit the tomb,

And rise to life and light again, and youth's redoubled bloom.

Then heart shall meet with kindred heart, and anthems loud shall rise,

And rapturous notes of harmony shall echo through the skies:

"All hail, thou great Deliverer!" the ransomed ones shall sing,

"O Grave, where is thy victory! O Death, where is thy sting!"

THE TREASURE-TROVE.

BY A. J. REQUIER.

'Twas in that season of the year
When, here and there, a crimson leaf
Among the pleasant foliage seems
A harbinger of grief—

When, with the sunset's tearful gleam,
A chill wind wasteth the green bowers,
And Mind perforce with Nature mourns,
Each for its summer flowers—

When all the birds of varied note,
And scented vine and slender tree,
Are flown or fading, and the woods
Have voices like the sea—

I met a maiden in my walk,
A blossom that was scarcely blown,
With summer folded in her heart,
And fragrant in her tone.

And soon came to her shaded eyes
A joy which none before had taught her—
A light soft as the mirrored star,
When dusk is on the water.

It was a look that met not mine,
But from it ever sought to rove;
And yet in this anxiety,
Was eloquent of love.

A stolen look, which, when I saw,
A sudden, tremulous tinge of rose Suffused her virgin cheek, and seemed
To break her heart's repose.

What could I do? the spring was gone;
The summer, too, was ebbing low;
And mounted autumn rides so fast
Toward the hills of snow!

I whispered! while her cheeks o'erflowed,
Deeper than rose or twilight stream;
And since, our mutual life has been
A reverie—a dream!

The leaf may fall, the blossom blow—
I have no season but her eyes;
And they are of the changeless hue
Of the blue summer skies.

THE FADED FLOWER.

BY HELEN HAMILTON.

I Laid her in her beauty down
In the lone forest dell,
When the deep shades of eventide
Around my pathway fell.

And not a single sunbeam pressed
The heavy clouds apart;
A shade was resting on the earth,
A deeper on my heart!

I watched long with a growing pride
Her beauty's radiant glow,
For death had set his awful seal
In beauty on her brow.

Her eyes were glorious with the light
Of brighter worlds than ours;
She faded slowly from the earth,
From young life's fairest flowers.

And now I sit alone, beneath
The weight of changeless sorrow:
This is no passing cloud of grief,
'Tis night without a morrow.

THE YOUTHFUL BARD.

BY NORMAN W. BRIDGE.

Ah! those he loved away have passed,
The ardent friends of early years,
On whose cold brows he looked his last,
With eyes suffused with burning tears.

Yes, many a cherished form is gone—
Laid low beneath the grassy sward;
And feeble weary, dark, and lone,
The spirit of the youthful bard.

Sad feels his heart as mem'ry ope
To view bright dreams of days gone by;
Sad 'tis to think his golden hopes
In youth were doomed to fade and die!

Each promised joy has come to naught,
And sickness now his strength is stealing;
His brain is steeped in anxious thought—
His form in pains of keenest feeling.

His cheek has lost its radiant hue—
His eye and brow are growing dim;
And dearest friends, once fond and true,
Have lost the love they felt for him.

He misses many a smiling lip—
A loving eye, a voice of truth—
And all the sweet companionship
With genial souls of kindred youth.

And now his heart has such a thirst
For early friendship's smile and tone,
It seems as though with grief 'twould burst,
When brooding o'er those treasures flown.

With bitterest pangs his soul is stirred,
To learn, in dark misfortune's hour,
But few could love a drooping bird—
A withered leaf—a faded flower.

Long has he drank of sorrow's cup;
Deep is the gloom his features wear:
There's naught can cheer his spirits up,
So filled his breast with dark despair.

And oft he feels, when none are nigh,
A smothered woe so full and deep;
'Tis sweet relief to breathe the sigh,
And melancholy bliss to weep.

Ah! life to him has lost its charms:
Sweet health is gone—youth's joys are fled;
No earthly hope his bosom warms—
He longs to slumber with the dead!

And feebly now his breast's core beats—
The vital thread Fate soon will sever;
Ere many morns his spirit greets,
His eyes may close, and close forever!

And when his form shall pulseless lie,
Outstretched beneath the coffin-lid;
Ah! who think you from Sorrow's eye
Will o'er his urn one tear-drop shed?

Who'll seek his grave at twilight hours,
When earth is robed in vernal bloom,
And o'er it strew those fragrant flowers
That speak of hope beyond the tomb.

Ah! none may mourn that he is gone—
No hand with flowers adorn the sward
Where dreamless sleeps, all cold and lone,
The casket of the youthful bard:

Nor glance from longing eyes o'er fall
Upon his lonely turf-clad cell;
Nor those he knew fond thoughts recall
Of him who loved all friendships well:

But dewy skies will o'er him weep,
And sighing winds lament his doom,
And stars he loved will nightly keep
Fond watch o'er his unfriended tomb.

IN EXTENUATION.

BY BERTHA BRAINERD

The sweetest bird that ever raised
Its morning song of praise to heaven,
Though soaring often to the skies,
Hath still most vainly striven
To live without the aid of earth,
Her berries ripe, her waters clear;
Though loud its song, and bold its flight,
Its nestling-place is here.

The fairest flower that ever shed
Its blessed fragrance on the air,
Though still by showers and sunbeams fed,
Had perished in their care,
Had not its roots still fondly clung
About the spot which gave them birth;
Though lovingly it looks above,
Its resting-place is earth.

If things as purely beautiful
As singing-birds, and perfumed flowers,
Cling still to earth, though softly wooed
By genial suns and showers,
Then I, more earthly far than they,
May for my frailty be forgiven,
Though for a human love I raise
My fervent prayers to heaven.

TO THE WEAK.

BY JANVIER.

Oh aching hearts, by care oppressed,
Oh weeping ones, that know no rest;
Oh mourners, that have suffered long;
Oh ye, the faint of heart, be strong!

Ye drooping ones, your sorrows bear;
Steel your weak breasts, repel despair;
For they who buffet with their fate,
And brave its anguish, shall be great!

Sorrow is power, and when ye bow,
And wild thoughts thrill the rending brow,
Look to the living skies, and see—
Fit emblem of your destiny—

Some struggling star, that, freed at length,
Bursts into brilliancy and strength,
And leaves the clouds, that clogged it so,
Alone to grovel on below.

THE SOLDIER'S DREAM OF HOME.

[Written on seeing the "Soldier's Dream of Home," in the March number of "Godey's Lady's Book."]

BY J. L. SWAN.

THE soldier now is resting on
The bank, at eventide;
His gun is leaning at his head,
His cap is by his side.

The lurid watchfires burn around
With an unsteady glare;
His soldier-comrades, bending low,
The evening meal prepare.

Slow rising up, the silver moon
Is dimmed by azure clouds;
A single star is shining bright
Amid the misty shrouds.

His gaze is upward, and his head
Is pillowed on his arm;
But Mem'ry, busy with the past,
Has sought another charm.

He sleeps! and dreams of home and love
Come flitting softly there,
Of her he made his youthful bride—
His baby-boy so fair.

Once more within his Highland home
He treads his native heath;
And every breeze that passes by
Is laden with its breath.

As dear, familiar objects meet
His anxious, tearful eye,
With beating heart, he seeks the home
Where all his treasures lie.

The goats upon the mountains browse;
The shepherd's song is heard:
At last he stands within his home,
Nor breathes a single word.

An ear has caught his weary tread—
An eye, his well-known face;
One moment more, his Jeannie's clasped
Within his warm embrace.

As, leaning o'er her sinking form,
"My father!" greets his ear,
A little Jean is bounding forth
To meet her father dear.

His eye sweeps in, with rapid glance,
Each object of his joy;
His Donald flies with outstretched arms—
No more his baby-boy.

His neighbors, joyous, hasten down
To meet their coming friend;
And in his welcome back to home
Their happy voices blend.

He starts! a shot is fired near—
Another follows now:
Too late! the fatal messenger
Has smote upon his brow.

And as the life-blood gushes forth
Upon the thirsty loam,
The soldier's dream is past for aye—
"The soldier's dream of home!"

THE SOLDIER'S DREAM OF HOME.

[From a Picture.]

BY FANNY FALES.

TEARS! tears! they gather as I gaze—
The soldier dreams of home—
The moon shines on his upturned face,
While blessed visions come:
But oh! the heart's light beams o'er all—
He hears his wife and children call.

He sees anear the humble cot—
The harvest sheaves around—
The pet goats browsing on the hill
With purple heather crowned;
The shouts of welcome reach the plain—
The soldier is at home again.

They fly to meet him—to his breast
He folds again his own;
His Jeannie's soft and loving arms
Around his neck are thrown:
Her bright lips to her own are pressed;
In dreams, the weary soldier's blest.

The pretty bird, his little "Jean,"
Born since he left the nest,
Stands, tiptoe, dimpling by his side,
And waits to be caressed:
With outstretched arms, wee Donald flies;
"Thank God for this!" the soldier cries.

Faded!—and was it but a dream?
Did not his spirit meet
The darlings by his mountain home,
And list their welcome sweet?
Oh! when the last long sleep came o'er,
Did not he clasp them as of yore?

PAUSE NOT.

BY H. COLMAN PAIGE.

PAUSE not! thou'lt reach the goal at last;
Thy scenes of toll and sorrow past
Will seem like dreams to thee:
And when thou'st gained the darling prize—
When vision's hope shall reach the skies—
Thrice happy then thou'lt be.

Pause not! whate'er the case may be,
"Faint heart ne'er yet won fair ladye,"
For despair sheds a chill
That leaves a dark'ning course behind,
And conquers all the powers of mind,
How strong soe'er thy will.

Pause not! the feeble arm is strong
When first is felt the hand of wrong;
Only vengeance can repay
The debt—but pass these by—
For fairer clouds will fill the sky,
And cause a brighter day.

Pause not! but battle earnestly;
Thy watchword e'er be "Liberty,"
And God will aid the Right;
For joyful hours will still be thine,
When hope and happiness combine,
And day succeeds the night.

LET ME DIE IN THE AUTUMN-TIME.

BY "MARY NEAL."

Let me die in the autumn-time,
When the winds are round me sighing;
When gone is summer's golden prime,
And her flowers are dead and dying:
Yes, then, when all things bright decay,
Let my spirit gently pass away.

Let me die 'neath the forest trees,
While their branches wave above me;
While my cheek is fanned by the cooling breeze,
And around are those who love me:
There, 'neath the broad blue dome of heaven,
Let my last farewell to earth be given.

Let me die at the sunset hour,
When the shadows fall around me;
When my heart is filled with its soothing power,
Let the chords be loosed that bound me:
When my last bright day on earth is done,
Let my soul depart with its setting sun.

'Tis a time I have ever loved,
The autumn sunset hour;
When my heart, by Nature's glories moved,
Hath knelt to her magic power:
When my soul hath sent forth to God above
Its meed of praise for this priceless love.

Then, loved ones left behind,
Lay my ashes gently there;
Let my dirge be sung by the autumn wind,
That once floated through my hair:
Let the leaves that once waved o'er me rest
Calmly and sweetly on my breast.

Then raise no costly tomb
My forest bed to trace;
But I'd have ye mark, by the wild flower's bloom,
My peaceful resting-place:
And plant one pure white rose, to shed
Its sweetest fragrance o'er my head.

And then, at sunset hour,
I would have ye sometimes come,
And pluck from thence a remembrance flower,
To bear in your bosom home:
And sometimes drop, while standing there—
'Tis all I ask—affection's tear.

LOVE AND TRUTH.

BY BLANCHE BENNAIRDE.

Love sought for Truth: a charming form drew near,
Arrayed in robes most fair; a form divine,
Upon whose brow was joy, whose eyes shone clear,
And many graces here seemed to combine:
I heard the music of a sweet-toned voice,
And thought that Love might surely here reside—
Where all was Truth—and evermore rejoice,
Without a cloud to darken or divide.
But when Love ventured to lift up his eyes,
He saw that he might linger there in vain,
For all that seemed so fair was flattering lies—
And then he fell to earth in grief and pain.
"Why should I hope!" said Love; "Truth is not there!"
And I was left to weep at Love's despair.

THE TWINS.

BY REV. B. T. F. CAKE.

'Twas a soft and mellow evening,
In the leafy month of June,
When summer bowers first opened
Their roseate blushing bloom,
That angel wings bore to me,
In the stillness of the night,
Heaven's blessing in a treasure
That ravished sense and sight.

Two innocent immortals
Was their angelic care;
Gems of a regal diadem,
They seemed the lovely pair;
Twin-born in time and feature,
In beauty and in grace,
Each seemed a very mirror
For his brother's form and face.

O Infinite! who formed them,
How perfect was thy touch!
How rich thy heavenly dower!
Could mortal crave so much?
That sense, nor limb, nor feature,
Should lack thy holy care—
That they in each, in everything,
Might God's own image bear.

I thank thee, O our Father,
Maker of worlds and men,
Thou'st given so rich a treasure
To give thee back again:
Oh, grant their hearts, with ours,
The grace, when life is done,
To be twin stars forever
In thy eternal crown!

THE HEART OF MAN IS LIKE A HARP.

BY JOHN A. CHAPMAN.

THE heart of man is like a harp
Of many thousand strings;
Touched by a skillful hand, a tone
Breathes from it sweet, or low, or sharp,
Or plaintive as a fairy's own,
When broken are its wings.

Oh! many are the notes that ring
From this poor heart of mine;
Sometimes 'tis like a joyous bird,
When at the first warm days of spring,
The fountain of all love is stirred,
Moved by a hand divine.

But then again sad tones of woe
Come from each trembling string;
Sad as the childless mother's heart,
When all she loved is laid below,
And the hot tears unbidden start
From her heart withering.

Deal gently with this wondrous harp—
Breathe on it soft and low;
Let every trembling note be free,
Whether of sweet, or low, or sharp,
That e'en the saddest tones may be
A melody in woe.

BED DRAPERIES.
(DESIGN FURNISHED BY CARRYL.)

THERE are two styles of chamber furniture now in vogue, which have almost equal claims to taste and fashion. At the North, where curtains are not indispensable, housekeepers seem to incline to the low French or couch bedsteads, with dressing-bureau and light cane-seated chairs to correspond. Further South, where mosquito-bars become a necessity, heavier furniture is more frequently found, the high posts being finely carved, and supporting a cornice of corresponding workmanship, as in the design given above. This is, perhaps, unusually rich, the lower cornice having a centre-piece, and the posts being surmounted by urns, in the style of our grandmothers. Who cannot recollect the heavy, time-worn furniture of some fine old country-house, where the wood is darkened by the passing of many years, and the tapestried coverings, with their antique stories, have faded from their once brilliant hues?

FOLLOWING upon the oaken sleeping closets, whose massive doors shut out alike sound and intrusion, they suited the lofty rooms for which they were originally designed, and now, in the rage for the furniture, as well as the customs of the Middle Ages, they have been revived with the improvement of lowering the bed itself within a more moderate and convenient distance of the floor. From the cornice, it will be noticed, depends a lambrequin of brocatelle, damask, or satin laine, as in window drapery, edged with a heavy frill of fringe, and having tassels dependent from the central points: the same may be placed at the deep scollop of the lambrequin upon the post. Beneath this are suspended the draperies, which are usually festooned with a heavy silk cord and tassel matching those upon the lambrequin. These draperies are sometimes of damask, etc., with lace curtains beneath, or simply lined with some pale or deep-tinted shade of silk: but more generally only the lace or muslin curtains are used, as it is well known that physicians do not now consider heavy curtains healthful. Mr. Carryl, whose undoubted taste in all such matters makes his judgment unquestioned, is an authority in all points of elegant upholstery. It is now quite the fashion to have the counterpane or bed-cover of some rich damask or satin laine, as in the cut, thus saving housekeepers much trouble, as they do not readily soil. Mr. Carryl has also imported cheap and tasteful embroidered muslin and lace curtains for French bedsteads, used by being drawn through a ring, or falling from a canopy suspended from the wall—the most graceful of all chamber adornments: in fine, his new stock comprises every article relating to bed draperies, of the plainer as well as more elegant styles.

ENGLISH EMBROIDERY.

HAVING promised our readers a description of this trimming, now so fashionable, we have selected a pattern suitable for underclothes, which is translated by the following explicit directions:—

To prepare this work, select a good and fine jaconet or French muslin, and tear off strips for the length required, allowing each to be at least one inch wider than the extreme width of the pattern. The strips must, of course, be torn on the width of the muslin, and the object of separating them is to secure a regularity in marking the design, as it is much more difficult to draw the pattern perfectly straight on a large piece of muslin.

Draw the design on good writing-paper, from the section given in the engraving, and ink it clearly; when it is dry, lay it under the muslin, put weights to keep it down, and trace the pattern on the material with a mixture of stone-blue dissolved in very thin gum-water, or white sugar and water, using a fine sable brush, or soft quill pen. When one length of the paper is marked over, move it along to the next piece of plain muslin, taking care that there are no breaks or defects in the pattern.

TO WORK THE BRODERIE.—With fine scissors, cut out all the holes of a small piece of the pattern—not at the marks, but within them, to allow a little for turning in, in working them round. For working, turn in the edge, by rolling it slightly with the thumb, as is done in common whipping, and sew it closely round. To pass from one hole to another, slip the needle on the wrong side.

The border is finished with the button-hole stitch, the outline having previously been traced in cotton. The holes, being so small, are not cut out, but made by piercing the muslin with a stiletto.

The materials for this work are very fine jaconet muslin, and Evans's embroidery cotton, No. 50.

4 shades of green, 12 rows of each; 2 needles. Cast on 3 stitches; knit plain, till before the centre stitch; thread forward, knit the centre stitch; thread forward, knit the remainder plain; purl the next row; repeat these two rows, till there are 12 open stitches up the vein of the leaf; then *knit 1, knit 2 together, knit plain till 2 from the centre stitch; then knit 2 together, thread forward, knit 1, thread forward, knit 2 together, knit plain, till 3 from the end; then knit 2 together, knit 1; purl the next row; repeat from * till there are 8 more open stitches, that is, 20 rows from the beginning; then knit 2 together at the beginning and end of every other row, till the leaf ends in a point. Now sew the leaves round the mat by the part where the stem should be; then sew the tulips on as in engraving, sewing the leaf about 6 rows from the point on to the stem of the tulip.

CHEMISETTES.

No. 1.

We give two styles of chemisettes, plainer than those usually engraved; but, at the same time, neat and ladylike.

No. 1 is composed of cambric muslin, an insertion extending around the throat, which is left open quite low. To this is attached a collar, turning back, of thick English cambric embroidery, in deep scallops. This chemisette is most suitable for merinos, or dark, plain silks.

No. 2 has a front of an entirely new style, in the shape of an elongated diamond, double, and edged with two narrow quillions, also of Swiss muslin, of which the whole chemisette is made. A double collar, in the same style, may be fastened by a brooch or a ribbon. It is quite suitable for mourning, being perfectly neat and plain, and, at the same time, relieving the sombre sameness of the garb.

For those ladies who do not care to go to much expense in their muslins, there is a saving of time, trouble, and material, to have the chemisette made like an ordinary "dickey," the collar falling over it at the throat, and the edges concealed beneath the dress. Chemisettes will be worn more or less through the winter.

PATTERNS FOR SILK EMBROIDERY.

This is intended for a continuous pattern, the pattern to be continued by uniting the ends.

KNITTED ARTIFICIAL FLOWERS.

HEART'S-EASE.

THIS flower requires five petals to form it, two violet and three yellow; one of the latter must be larger than the rest, and of a deeper color. All the wool must be split.

For the violet petals, cast on ten stitches on two needles, five on each; fold the two needles so as to bring the last stitch behind the first, and double knit a piece of rather more than half an inch in length, taking one stitch from one needle, and one from the other throughout each row. When you take the needles out, run the wool through them with a rug needle, and pass a piece of double wire through the little bag which the knitting has formed, catch it at the top and sides to keep it in form, draw up the other end, and twist the wires together after having shaped the wire to the form of the petal. The yellow petals are knitted in the same way, the largest requires twelve stitches, and the last four or six rows must be done with violet wool, to form the dark spot at the top. The two smaller yellow petals only require eight stitches, with two or four rows of violet at the top; twist the wires of the five petals together, and cover the stem with green wool; a cross stitch, like herring-bone, should be made with green wool, where the petals join in the middle of the flower.

FOR THE CALYX,

Thread a needle with whole green wool, fasten this on the stem, at the back of the flower, and take a herring stitch at the back of each petal, making the stitch rather long, and leaving the wool loose. The bud is formed by making a little tuft of yellow, violet, and green wool, mixed together; fix it on a piece of wire by crossing the wool over, and twisting the wire very tight, turn the ends of the wool down the wire, and fasten them at about a quarter of an inch down, by twisting some green split wool round, with which the little stem must be also covered.

LEAVES.

Fasten off the two last stitches.

It is on this principle that all kinds of indented leaves are made; by knitting more rows with increase between the castings off, they are made broader; by working more rows between the castings off, they are made longer; and by casting off more stitches at a time, the indentations are made deeper; so that the endless variety of natural leaves may be copied without difficulty.

Having completed the leaves, some wire must be sewn neatly round, following the turnings of the leaf exactly; and for the larger ones, it will be better to sew a double wire in the centre of the leaf at the back, which will conceal the openings left by the increase of stitches.

One or two flowers, with a bud, and two or three leaves, are sufficient for a small branch.

FUCHSIA.

If knitted in good size China silk, it does well to ornament caps or bonnets.

CALYX.

Four calyx are required for each flower; cast on eight stitches with crimson split wool.

1st row.—Knit plain. 2d.—Purl.

3d.—Knit plain. 4th.—Purl.

5th.—Make one, knit two; repeat to the end of row.

6th.—Purl. | 7th.—Knit plain.

8th.—Purl. 9th.—Knit plain.

10th.—Purl. 11th.—Knit plain.

12th.—Purl.

13th.—Make one, knit three; repeat to the end of row.

14th.—Purl.

15th.—Make one, knit four; repeat.

16th.—Purl.

17th.—Make one, knit five to the end of row.

18th.—Knit six stitches, turn back and purl the same (leaving the rest of the stitches on the needle). Continue knitting and purling the six stitches until you have six small rows; then decrease one stitch, knit four; next row, decrease one, purl three, knit a row plain; then decrease one, purl two; lastly slip one, knit two together, turn the slipped stitch over, fasten the wool by putting it through the last stitch. This completes one division of the calyx. Break off the wool, leaving about a yard on the work, in order neatly to carry down the wool to the stitches, which are still on the needle. Then, with the same wool, knit six more stitches, which must be done especially as the first, forming the second division, and with the same wool knit the third and fourth, which finishes the calyx.

Sew a bit of fine wire (with the same split wool) round the end of each division, and the ends of the wire must be sown two by two on the inside of the flower before it is sown up.

COROLLA.

The corolla is small in the Fuchsia, and less apparent than the calyx. The color of the wool must be either purple or dark puce.

Cast on eight stitches.

1st row.—Knit plain.

2d.—Purl.

3d.—Make one, knit two; repeat throughout the row.

4th.—Purl.

5th.—Knit plain.

6th.—Purl.

7th.—Make one, knit three; throughout the row.

8th.—Purl.

9th.—Knit plain.

10th.—Purl.

11th.—Knit four stitches, turn back, decrease one, purl two, and finish by slipping one, knitting two together, turning the slipped stitch over, and putting the wool through the loop; bring the wool down the edge in the same way as for the calyx, and knit the second, third, and fourth divisions like the first. Sew a bit of wire round the edge, following the sinuosities of the work, and sew the two edges together.

The pistil and stamen can be made like the lily, but very much finer and smaller; but a simpler and easier method is, to stiffen some pale green, or white sewing cotton, with gum, and cut eight pieces of it, of about five or six inches long, for the stamen, and one bit rather longer for the pistil; tie them together, and dip the longest in gum, and then in some green powder, or wool cut as fine as powder, and the rest, first in gum, and then immediately in yellow powder, or wool cut as fine, which will answer quite as well for the purpose. Mount your flower, by placing the stamens and pistil inside the corolla, and that too within the calyx, sufficiently low to show the corolla slightly; sew the open side of the calyx, and twist all the stalks together, covering the little stem with green wool.

BUDS.

Cast on four stitches, knit one row plain, purl one row.

3d row.—Make one stitch, knit one throughout the row.

4th.—Purl.

5th.—Knit plain.

6th.—Purl.

7th.—Make one, knit two throughout the row.

8th.—Purl.

9th.—Knit plain.

10th.—Purl.

Then gather all the stitches with a rug needle, make a little ball of red wool, put a bit of wire across it, fold over, and twist the wire quite tight, cover the little ball with the piece just knitted, sew the opening neatly, and gather up the stitches at the stem, which must be covered with crimson wool.

LEAF.

Cast on three stitches, knit, and purl alternate rows, increasing one stitch at the beginning of each row until the leaf is of the breadth desired (about seven stitches for the smallest, and fourteen or sixteen stitches for the largest); then knit and purl four rows without increase, and begin to decrease in every row, until you have but three stitches left, which knit as one, and fasten off. Sew a fine wire round the leaves, leaving a small bit at the end as a stalk, and also a fine wire doubled, at the back of the leaf, in the centre, which will keep it in shape.

Several shades and sizes of leaves are required, as also several buds and flowers, to form a handsome branch.

EDITORS' TABLE.

"Festivals, when duly observed, attach men to the civil and religious institutions of their country; it is an evil, therefore, when they fall into disuse. Who is there who does not recollect their effect upon himself in early life?"—SOUTHEY.

THE American people have two peculiar festivals, each connected with their history, and therefore of great importance in giving power and distinctness to their nationality.

THE FOURTH OF JULY is the exponent of independence and civil freedom. THANKSGIVING DAY is the national pledge of Christian faith in God, acknowledging him as the dispenser of blessings. These two festivals should be joyfully and universally observed throughout our whole country, and thus incorporated in our habits of thought as inseparable from American life.

Our Independence Day is thus celebrated. Wherever an American is found, the Fourth of July is a festival; and those nations who sit in chains and darkness feel that there is hope even for them, when the American flag is raised in the triumph of freedom. Would not the light of liberty be dimmed were this observance to cease?

Thanksgiving Day is a festival of ancient date in New England, being established there soon after the settlement of Boston. The observance has been gradually extending; and, for a few years past, efforts have been made to have a fixed day, which shall be universally observed throughout our whole country. The "Lady's Book" was the pioneer in this endeavor to give unity to the idea of Thanksgiving Day, and thus make it a national observance.

The last Thursday in November was selected as the day, on the whole, most appropriate. Last year, twenty-nine States, and all the Territories, united in the festival. This year, we trust that Virginia and Vermont will come into this arrangement, and that the Governors of each and all the States and Territories will appoint Thursday, the 26th of November, as the Day of Thanksgiving.

The year 1852 would thus be an era from which to date the establishment of this national festival; and henceforth, wherever an American is found, the last Thursday in November would be the Thanksgiving Day. Families may be separated so widely that personal reunion would be impossible; still this festival, like the Fourth of July, will bring every American heart into harmony with his home and his country. The influence of such an American festival on foreigners would also be salutary, by showing them that our people acknowledge the Lord as our God. In our own wide land, from the St. John's to the Rio Grande, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, every heart would, on one day in each year, beat in unison of enjoyment and thankfulness.

Therefore, we hope to witness this year the first of these national festivals.

DUSSONS.—It is a mortifying fact that people love to be deceived. Many choose to live in darkness when the light is all around them: it would seem impossible they should be thus blind, did we not have the evidence of their folly before us. How any sane person can put faith in spirit rappings, and the manifestations made by the cunning speculators in this new way of divination, is a greater marvel than any the mediums have pretended to set forth. But there is one consolation. The folly and wickedness of these delusions are harmless and weak compared with those that resulted from the witchcraft mania of 1602.

During that sad year, the delusion had its beginning and ending, so far as the tragic drama was enacted. "It opened in the following manner: Near the close of the month of February, 1602, two little girls in the family of the Rev. Mr. Parris, Elizabeth, his daughter, aged nine, and Abigail Williams, his niece, about twelve years of age, together with a young girl of the neighborhood, named Ann Putnam, began to act in a strange and unaccountable manner. They would creep into holes, and under benches and chairs, and put themselves into odd postures, make antic gestures, and utter loud outcries, and ridiculous, incoherent, and unintelligible expressions. The attention of the family was arrested. No account or explanation of the conduct of the children could be given, and so physicians were called in and consulted. One of these sapient men gave it as his opinion that the children were bewitched! From this encouragement, the delusion went on gathering strength and power in its frightful course, till the lives of twenty innocent persons, accused of witchcraft, had been sacrificed, a number of others condemned, and over three hundred had suffered, more or less severely, from imprisonment, or by fleeing from their homes.

Such scenes cannot be re-enacted. The rappers may take money from their dupes; they cannot touch those who refuse to be deluded by their mummeries. Thus we find our people have made sensible progress during the last one hundred and sixty years. Still the tendency of mind, which puts faith in marvels of human invention, while rejecting God's Word as the only rule of moral and spiritual enlightenment, is still witnessed; and the selfishness which uses this weakness for its own wicked purposes of gaining power and money is now manifested in a most disgusting form. The following is taken from the "Boston Courier," a paper of high repute in that city:—

"A CONVENTION OF 'SPIRITUALISTS.'—A convention of professed believers in 'spiritual manifestations'—men and women—assembled in Washingtonian Hall, Bromfield Street, yesterday morning (August 6th). It was a singular collection of dupes and fanatics, resembling more a congregation of lunatics than a company of rational creatures. In fact, we have never seen the like outside the walls of a mad-house."

We cannot enter into the details of this revolting spectacle, where men and women seemed striving to outdo each other in fanatical fooleries. But though the rappings, like the witchcraft delusion, were originated by females, we find the deception encouraged and systematized by men for their own advantage, in a far greater degree than by our sex. The officers and chief actors in this "Spiritualists' Convention" were men.

Our readers have no sympathy with these insane movements, and our only reason for noticing the subject is that, when our "Book," a century hence, is referred to as a specimen of the literature of the nineteenth century, it may be apparent we did not, even by silence, assent to the humbug—to use a vulgar, but for this folly a most appropriate name—of "spirit rappers."

WOMEN NEED EMPLOYMENT.—Yes, women need a wider sphere of employments for their tastes, talents, and the affections. Then they would not invent delusions. Give them something to do which men consider important, and, if the education of the women has been at all judicious, see if their work be not well done. The Institution of Kaiserswerth, on the Rhine, has been alluded to in our pages both by Mrs. Hill and Miss Bremer. We have now before us a pamphlet, published in London, giving a full description of the manner in which the good Pastor Fliedner has succeeded in training female students to take charge of the sick and the poor, and superintend hospitals, infant and industrial schools, and, in short, to be the educators and preservers of humanity. He gives to those he sends out the title of Deaconesses. The English writer thus urges the revival of that order of women in every Protestant country:—

"The want of necessary occupation among English girls must have struck every one. How usual it is to see families of five or six daughters at home, in the higher ranks, with no other occupation in life but a class in a Sunday school. And what is that? A chapter of the Bible is opened at random, and the spiritual doctor, with no more idea of her patient's spiritual anatomy than she has plan for improving it, explains at random.

"In the middle classes, how many there are who feel themselves burdensome to their fathers, or brothers, but who, not finding husbands, and not having the education to be governesses, do not know what to do with themselves.

"Intellectual education is, however, as before said, not what we want to supply. Is intellect enough for the being who was sent here, like her great Master, to 'finish' her Father's 'work'? There was a woman once, who said that she was the 'handmaid of the Lord.' She was not the first, nor will she be the last, who has felt that this was really woman's only business on earth.

"If, then, there are many women who live unmarried, and many more who pass the third of the usual term of life unmarried, and if intellectual occupation is not meant to be their end in life, what are they to do with that thirst for action, useful action, which every woman feels who is not diseased in mind or body? God planted it there. God, who has created nothing in vain. What were His intentions with regard to 'unmarried women and widows'? How did He mean to employ them, to satisfy them?

"For every want we can always find a divine supply. And accordingly, we see, in the very first times of Christianity, an apostolical institution for the employment of woman's powers directly in the service of God. We find them engaged as 'servants of the Church.' We read, in the Epistle to the Romans, of a 'Deaconess,' as in the Acts of the Apostles, of 'Deacons.' Not only men were employed in the service of the sick and poor, but also women. In the fourth century, St. Chrysostom speaks of forty Deaconesses at Constantinople. We find them in the Western Church as late as the eighth, in the Eastern, as the twelfth century. When the Waldenses, and the Bohemian and Moravian brothers began to arise out of the night of the Middle Ages, we find in these communities, formed after the model of the apostolical institutions, the office of Deaconesses, who were called Presbyteræ, established in 1457. 'Many chose,' it is said, 'the single state, not because they expected thereby to reach a supereminent degree of holiness, but that they might be the better able to care for the sick and the young.'

"Luther complains how few, in his neighborhood, are found to fill the office of Deacons, saying that he must wait 'till our Lord God makes Christians,' and further adds, that 'women have especial grace to alleviate woe, and the words of women move the human being more than those of men.' In the sixteenth century, it is well known how Robert von der Mark, Prince of Sedan in the Netherlands, revived the institution of Protestant Sisters of Charity, and, instead of appropriating the revenues of the suppressed monasteries in his domains, devoted them to this purpose. In the first General Synod of the Evangelical Church of the Lower Rhine and the Netherlands, at Weel, 1668, we find the office of Deaconesses recommended, and, in the Classical Synod, of 1680, expressly established. In England, they were not wanting. Among the Non-Conformists, under Elizabeth, 1576, Deaconesses were instituted during divine service, and received amidst the general prayer of the community. The Pilgrim Fathers of 1602—1626, who were driven first to Amsterdam and Leyden, then to North America, carried their Deaconesses with them. In Amsterdam, we read how 'the Deaconess sat in her place at church with a little birchen rod in her hand, to correct the children,' and 'how she called upon the young maidens for their services, when there were sick,' and how 'she was obeyed like a mother in Israel.'

"It thus appears that, long previous to the establishment of the Order of Sisters of Mercy, by S. Vincent de Paulo, in 1633, the importance of the office of Deaconess had been recognized by all divisions of Christians; and they accordingly existed.

"We see, therefore, that God has not implanted an impulse in the hearts of women, without preparing a way for them to obey it.

"Why did not the Institution spread and flourish further? Perhaps this may be sufficiently explained by the fact that there were no nursery-grounds—preparatory schools for Deaconesses, so that fitness for their office was, so to speak, accidental. This want is now supplied.

"In Prussia, the system for the practical training of Deaconesses has spread in all directions.

"In Paris, Strasburg, Echallens (in Switzerland), Utrecht, and England, the institution exists. Whether the blessing be greater to the class from which the laborers are taken, or to that among which they labor, it is hard to say."

In our next number, we will give the history of the Institution of Kaiserswerth.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "To my Mother," "The Zephyr's Message," and "The Periwinkle."

Not accepted: "The Tide of Life."

We have a mass of manuscripts on hand not yet read. The warm weather has induced the editress to take a trip. Upon her return, she will give immediate attention to the contributions.

"Lines to Mrs. Hale" have been received. They are gratefully acknowledged by the publisher, and will be submitted with the manuscripts.

In answer to our correspondent from Cleveland, Ohio, we do not know a writer by that name.

"Mary," Salem, Mass., is informed that she must make a new mesh for the Instep. We have a work on knitting for the nursery. We will also give instructions for knitting several other kinds of fruit.

"Anna." We have destroyed the MSS. agreeably to your request. We published, in the August number, for 1850, under the title of "A Glean of Moonshine," an article very similar.

Persons asking advice, or writing upon business of their own, where an answer is required, must inclose a post-office stamp, or we shall neglect paying postage on the answer.

Literary Notices.

TALES OF MY LANDLORD. Second Series. "The Heart of Mid-Lothian" and "The Bride of Lammermoor." Vols. 3 and 4. We would appear somewhat ridiculous in the eyes of our readers, were we, at this late day, to attempt to eulogize the "Waverley Novels." But we may be permitted, in all truthfulness, to call their attention to the beautiful edition now in progress through the press of Lippincott, Grambo & Co., of this city. This edition embraces the author's latest corrections, notes, &c. It is printed upon fine paper, new and beautiful type, with illustrations, and neatly bound in cloth, for twelve dollars; or, if taken in parts, in paper, fifty cents a volume. It will be comprised in twelve volumes, each volume, or part, to contain a complete novel. The best edition now publishing.

THE MORMONS, OR LATTER-DAY SAINTS, in the Valley of the Great Salt Lake. A History of their Rise and Progress, Peculiar Doctrines, Present Condition, and Prospects, derived from Personal Observation, during a Residence among them. By Lieutenant J. Gunnison, of the Topographical Engineers. As this politico-religious sect is daily growing in numbers and importance, in a moral as well as in a national view, we conceive that the author of this work has performed a high public duty in presenting us with an impartial account of their faith and its tendencies. His object has not been to ridicule the folly or the glaring absurdities of their faith, but merely to state what it is, leaving his readers to infer, from the facts stated, its irrational and unscriptural pretensions. He tells us that their priests are the civil officers, and they go so far as to say that our Saviour had three wives, Mary and Martha, and the other Mary, whom Jesus loved, all married at the wedding in Canaan of Galilee. That a people, formed into a State under such a civil and religious code, can be tolerated even under the liberal constitution of the United States, is a question which remains to be decided. It is one which involves the existence and the force, not only of our country's nationality, but of those principles of the common law which have heretofore been considered of universal application.

From A. HART (late Carey & Hart), corner of Fourth and Chestnut Street, Philadelphia:—

The third and fourth volumes of Hart's cheap edition of the WAVERLEY NOVELS. Embracing the "Antiquary" and "Rob Roy," each complete in one volume. Price 25 cents. This is a very beautiful edition of the favorite author's works.

LECTURES ON THE RESULTS OF THE EXHIBITION, Delivered before the Society of Arts, and Manufactures, and Commerce, at the suggestion of H. R. H. Prince Albert, President of the Society. These lectures are twelve in number, and embrace every branch of the sciences and arts, manufactures and mechanics; specimens of which were produced at the late exhibition of art and industry in London. A most desirable set of books.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through LINDSAY & BLACKISTON, Philadelphia:—

PIERRE; OR, THE AMBIGUITIES. By Herman Melville. We really have nothing to add to the severity of the critical notices which have already appeared in respect to this elegantly printed volume; for, in all truth, all the notices which we have seen have been severe enough to satisfy the author, as well as the public, that he has strangely mistaken his own powers and the patience of his friends in presuming to leave his native element, the ocean, and his original business of harpooning whales, for the mysteries and "ambiguities" of metaphysics, love, and romance. It may be, however, that the heretofore intelligible and popular author has merely assumed his present transcendental metamorphosis, in order that he may have range and scope enough to satirize the ridiculous pretensions of some of our modern literati. Under the supposition that such has been his intention, we submit the following notice of his book, as the very best off-hand effort we could make in imitation of his style: Melodiously breathing an inane mysteriousness, into the impalpable airiness of our unsearchable sanctum, this wonderful creation of its ineffable author's sublime-winged imagination has been fluttering its snow-like-invested pinions upon our multitudinous table. Mysteriously breathing an inane melody, it has been beautifying the innermost recesses of our visual organs with the luscious purpleness and superb goldness of its exterior adornment. We have listened to its outbreathing of sweet-swarming sounds, and their melodious, mournful, wonderful, and unintelligible melodiousness has "dropped like pendulous, glittering icicles," with soft-ringing silveriness, upon our never-to-be-delighted-sufficiently organs of hearing; and, in the insignificant significances of that deftly-stealing and wonderfully-serpentine melodiousness, we have found an infinite, unbounded, inexpressible mysteriousness of nothingness.

MYSTERIES, AND GLIMPSES OF THE SUPERNATURAL: containing Accounts of the Salem Witchcraft, the Cocklane Ghost, the Rochester Rappings, the Stratford Mysteries, Oracles, Astrology, Dreams, Demons, Ghosts, Spectres, &c. &c. By Charles Wyllis Elliott. The author of this book deserves great credit for the pains he has taken to arm the credulous with arguments and facts against the impositions which are continually practised upon them by impious pretenders to divine and supernatural powers. If there are any features in the mental developments of the present age which lead us to doubt its superiority over the past, it is the evidences which are daily brought under our consideration of the ready submission paid to a class of pretenders, such as would not have been tolerated even in the dark ages. To enlighten the ignorant, and to sustain the weak-minded, who are now, as they were in former periods, the unresisting dupes of knaves and hypocrites, is a work of humanity which deserves the approbation and encouragement of every member of society. And this approbation, without endorsing all his sentiments, we willingly extend to the author of "Mysteries," for his efforts in behalf of truth, and in opposition to superstition, falsehood, and folly.

THE HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, from the Adoption of the Federal Constitution to the end of the Sixteenth Congress. By Richard Hildreth. Volume 3. Madison and Monroe. We have favorably noticed the preceding volumes of this able national work. We are aware that there is much in the volume before us, as happened to be the case in the two former volumes, which will not prove to be entirely palatable, either in regard to men or measures, to the surviving party politicians of either of the two "old schools." It will probably be conceded, however, even by the old partisans, that their views in respect to the men and measures of the exciting period to which the volume before us particularly refers, have long since undergone a radical change of sentiment. And, by the younger class of readers and politicians, who have assumed the places of the former, it will perhaps be acknowledged that the work is susceptible of furnishing facts, and of establishing views of political events, and of the actors who participated in those events, very different from the facts and impressions which they had previously received, traditionally, or through the mere partisan records of the times in which the events happened, and in which the actors lived. Judging, however, from our own remembrance and limited knowledge of the events as they transpired, and as they are recorded in the volume before us, we cannot hesitate to say that the author has performed his task, so far, with scrupulous impartiality and justice, and that he is therefore worthy of the respect and confidence of the American reader.

A LATIN-ENGLISH AND ENGLISH-LATIN DICTIONARY, FOR THE USE OF SCHOOLS. Chiefly from the Lexicons of Freund, Georges, and Kaldischmidt. By Charles Anthon, LL. D., Professor of the Greek and Latin Languages in Columbia College, Rector of the Grammar School, etc. Part 1. Latin-English. This work has been prepared with great care from a translation by Mr. Riddle of Dr. Freund's "Gesamptwörterbuch der Lateinischen Sprache," and is designed to supply a deficiency that has long existed in our educational books for younger students of the Latin language.

LOTUS-EATING. A Summer Book. By Charles William Curtis, author of "Nile Notes," etc. The sketches in this work will greatly interest northern travellers, particularly such as intend loitering awhile at Niagara, and the mountain and sea-shore watering-places.

THE CHILD AT HOME; or, the Principles of Filial Duty Familiarly Illustrated. By John S. C. Abbott, author of "The Mother at Home." Very greatly improved and enlarged, with engravings. An excellent book to place in the hands of young readers.

From TICKNOR, REED, & FIELDS, Boston, through W. P. HAZARD, Philadelphia:—

THE BLITHEDALE ROMANCE. By Nathaniel Hawthorne. The author of this romance has risen rapidly in favor as a writer of fiction, both at home and abroad, within the few years past. We can recollect, it is true, when Nathaniel Hawthorne was comparatively in obscurity, and when scarcely any one who had the least regard for his own literary pretensions, unless he was a very independent thinker, would venture to speak favorably of his genius or talents. But men's minds have changed, and Nathaniel Hawthorne, if he does not make one of those mistakes so common to great minds and sudden favorites with the public, is bound to maintain his position as quietly and triumphantly as he attained it. The works of this author are now ranked with the highest literary efforts of his countrymen. "Blithedale" seems to be one of those serious lessons on the mental follies and philosophic or philanthropic extravagancies of the times, which may, in some measure, be relied upon for its influence in checking the exuberance of "new ideas," and in bringing back bewildered, but well-meaning people to the usages and requirements of common sense.

From G. P. PUTNAM, New York, through W. B. ZIEGLER, Philadelphia:—

SCENES AND THOUGHTS IN EUROPE. By George H. Calvert. Second Series. There are many reflections in this book which will attract and merit the attention of the general reader. In regard to the author's theological opinions, however, we question very much whether they will prove any more satisfactory to Protestants than to Catholics. He seems, indeed, to think that Christianity was a failure, even from the time of the Apostles; for he says, "Only in Jesus himself burnt purely the light of his revelation. The Apostles, his agents, were tainted with Judaism. And soon the spirit of priestcraft, which had crucified Jesus, took possession of his doctrine and soiled it." In a previous sentence, the author makes an avowal of his thoughts, which we apprehend will be conclusive in regard to his "Rationalism," the new system which, particularly in Germany, is making war upon the common faith of Protestants and Catholics. These are his words: "But deeper and stronger than either Catholicism, than Protestantism, both perishable, is the imperishable Christian principle of liberty, the quenchless longing for absolute mental freedom." The fact is, that his thrusts at that which he considers the most odious of the two Christian systems are made so vigorously and thoroughly, they pierce the vital principles of both alike.

POPULAR AND PRACTICAL SCIENCE. The Laws of Life, with especial reference to the Physical Education of Girls. By Elizabeth Bakewell, M. D. The author of these lectures was the first of her sex to open the way, in this country at least, to the attainment of medical knowledge, and to practice the science professionally. We can all recollect the obloquy and ridicule against which she had to struggle, and we have all witnessed her noble triumph, alike honorable to herself and to her country, and proving to the world that the female mind is susceptible of as high a state of vigorous mental cultivation as has heretofore been exclusively claimed as fit only for the minds of men. In her brief dedication to American women, we are told that these lectures were delivered to a class of ladies during the past spring; that they are presented as outlines of truth, and ideas of the right method of education, rather than as a full discussion of the subject. The outlines are, in our opinion, correctly and scientifically drawn, and the ideas beautifully and glowingly expressed. The volume is in a cheap form, but very handsomely printed, and contains more practical information for the female mind than could be found in twenty novels, each of the same number of pages. Price 25 cents.

From REDDING & Co., Boston:—

SPECIMENS OF NEWSPAPER LITERATURE: with Personal Memoirs, Anecdotes, and Reminiscences. By Joseph T. Buckingham. In two volumes. We have examined the contents of these volumes with unusual interest, and feel assured that "all printers and conductors of the newspaper press," to whom they have been particularly dedicated by the author, will find in them abundant matter for reflection, as well as of caution and advice. It is too plain, however, from the record before us, that, with all the progress we are presumed to have made in morality and general intelligence, in literature and in the arts and sciences, the character of the newspaper and political press has made but little, if any improvement. And, that there has been any improvement, only a few, perhaps, will be found willing to admit; for it has, indeed, grown into a habit with us to denounce the licentiousness and the vulgar vituperation of the public press in our times, as unprecedented for its reckless boldness in the annals of "newspaper literature." It is certainly true, that we have continually at command some "specimens," which, to say the least of them, are bad enough. But, bad as they may be, we believe that nothing of the kind can be produced in our day more personal, more vindictive, malicious, or aggravating, than the "specimens" of newspaper controversy, rivalry, and jealousy which the author has here produced in this collection of "newspaper literature," and as "specimens" of its career from the very first establishment of the press on this continent. Nevertheless, we hope none of our newspaper contemporaries of the present day will attempt to profit by the examples or "specimens" introduced by the author of this book, so as to extenuate their conduct in regard to the evils which are at this day apparent in a free press. In looking over the memoir of Benjamin Russell, we can applaud his zeal in behalf of liberty and the rights of his country, and we can now forgive his impassioned, and sometimes unfair attacks upon his political opponents in the first days of the republic; but, after all, when we see his newspaper and himself, as it were, dying in the arms of a party on whom he had poured out the vials of his wrath for years, we should all of us be admonished of the end. These volumes, therefore, as we said at the commencement, are good for advice, for reproof, and worthy of the calm reflection of all who attempt to control the independent press of a free country. As we often receive admonitions from our newspaper friends in regard to "pictures" and "fashions," we hope we do not intrude in admonishing them of some of the merits of Mr. Buckingham's "specimens."

NOVELS, SERIALS, PAMPHLETS, &c.

From Harper & Brothers, New York, through Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia: "Pictorial Field Book of the Revolution." No. 25. Price 25 cents.—"London Labor and London Poor." Part 21. Price 25 cents.

From Robert E. Peterson & Co., N. W. corner of Fifth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia: "The National Portrait Gallery of Distinguished Americans, with Biographical Sketches: containing upwards of one hundred and twenty engraved Portraits of the most Eminent Persons who have occupied a place in the History of the United States." Nos. 2 and 3. Price 25 cents. The second number contains the portraits of Jefferson, Hancock, and Carroll; the third, those of Scott, Wayne, and McDonough. This work richly merits the approbation of the American public.

From Hermann J. Meyer, 164 William Street, New York: Nos. 2, 3, and 4 of "Meyer's Universum." Price 25 cents each part. The engravings in these numbers are very beautiful, and the letter-press descriptions highly interesting. Welk & Wiek, 195 Chestnut Street, are the sole agents for Philadelphia.

From Gould & Lincoln, Boston, through W. B. Zieber, Philadelphia: "Chambers's Pocket Miscellany." Vol. 4. Price 25 cents.

From Stringer & Townsend, New York, through W. B. Zieber, Philadelphia: "The Upper Ten Thousand: Sketches of American Society." By C. Astor Bristed. A new edition. The contents of this book were originally published in parts, in Fraser's (London) Magazine. It is understood, however, that the characters and the scenes introduced by the author are all from real life, and represent truly the social system as it exists among the aristocratic leaders of fashion and folly in New York.

From A. Hart (late Carey & Hart): "The Discarded Daughter; or, the Children of the Isle." A Tale of the Chesapeake. By Emma D. E. Nevitt Southworth. In two volumes. Price 75 cents. A very interesting tale.

From T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia: "Life in the South." A companion of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." By C. H. Wiley, of North Carolina.—"The Necromancer; or, the Mysteries of the Court of Henry the Eighth." Vol. 2. By G. W. M. Reynolds.

From Stringer & Townsend, New York, through T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia: "The Heirs of Randolph Abbey." One of the best novels of the day, and, as the "London Literary Gazette" says, "The most brilliant production since 'Jane Eyre.'" The call for this novel is so great, that the publishers find some difficulty in supplying the demand.

Stringer & Townsend, of New York, advertise a splendid catalogue of books, among which will be found a complete edition of "Cooper's Novels"—uniform periodical edition—in all, sixty-five volumes, in paper covers, at twenty-five cents each. The cheapest edition of the works of this great novelist ever published.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

Four full page engravings again, and we mean to keep it up. We may challenge all previous efforts to eclipse the two leading plates in this number. Our reading matter is also of a very superior order.

As we do not wish to bore our subscribers with the "opinions of the press," though they sound sweetly to us, we ask attention, if they choose to give it, to the notices on our cover. As Sheridan says, "When they do agree, their unanimity is wonderful."

"THE SORROWS OF A WEALTHY CITIZEN," published in our July number, seems to have created a great sensation in the city. Everybody says, "That is just my case;" "I wish you published it; but it is not quite strong enough." It has been very extensively copied.

We are now able to supply the orders for "Godey's Gallery of Splendid Engravings," having printed a new supply, which we think will last us at least a month. The demand for them is very great. The "Independent Democrat," of Concord, N. H., says:—

"GODEY'S GALLERY OF SPLENDID ENGRAVINGS.—Godey, of the 'Lady's Book,' has commenced a serial of engravings, with the above title, which promises to possess many attractions, especially for the ladies. The first number has thirty plates, mostly steel and mezzotint, and many of them very beautiful and finely executed."

PARTICULAR attention is called to the paragraph in the advertisement of "Arthur's Home Gazette" on our cover, giving a list of the contents of his paper. This is now the best, while it is one of the cheapest, weekly papers published; and, to meet this spirit on the part of the proprietor, we have agreed to club with him on the following low terms: "Godey's Lady's Book" and "Arthur's Home Gazette" each sent one year for $3 50. These are certainly the most reasonable terms on which two first class works can be obtained. Only fifty cents more than the price of the "Lady's Book" will procure the best of the Philadelphia weekly papers. The money must be remitted at one time.

THE biographies of the elder Mrs. Adams, Mrs. Hamilton, and Mrs. Madison will be continued in the November and succeeding numbers.

WE copy the following, as it is particularly suitable to a class of persons who come under the head of "slow" subscribers. The truth is homely, but not the less forcible:—

"NON-PAYING SUBSCRIBERS.—Wagons cannot run without wheels, boats without steam, bull-frogs jump without legs, or a newspaper be carried on, an everlasting time, no more than a dog can wag his tail when he has none. Our subscribers are all good; but what good does a man's goodness do when it don't do you any good? We have no doubt every one thinks that all have paid except him, and, as we are a clever fellow, and his is a little matter, it will make no difference. It would not, if it were only confined to a dozen or a hundred cases; but when the slow fever seizes most all, the complaint is altogether too general. As the bull-frog said, 'It's fun for you; but it's death to us.'

SIGNIFICANT SIGN.—A clockmaker in New York has the sign of a clock, on the face of which a boy is represented as undergoing a flagellation from his master for coming too late to school. His excuse is, "Mother has no clock." As clocks and watches are merely the representatives of passing time, as at present constructed, it has appeared to us that the ingenious device of the New York clockmaker might be extended so as to remind others of "larger growth" than the school-boy, of some of their more important moral and social duties. We could point out many maxims, had we the leisure at this time, which would be of universal application, and which would be likely to produce a great moral reform. But, as we have not the leisure at this time, owing to the fact that "time is money," and that money is the means by which we live, and amuse and hope to instruct our readers, we can only, and briefly, mention one device which the whole fraternity of editors throughout the country would like to see engraven on all the clocks in the houses, and on all the watches at the sides of all the ladies and in the fobs of all the gentlemen, the simple words, "PAY THE PRINTER!" Oh, conscience, conscience, how could you evade such emphatic admonitions made to you hourly by the records of time, dunning you incessantly for the fulfilment of your promises!

We call attention to the advertisement of Dr. Ayer's medicines, published on the cover of this number.

We have received a card printed at the office of the "Minden (La.) Herald." Some of our job printers in this city would like to know how such neat work is done. It is really one of the prettiest business cards we ever saw, and a credit to any office.

EDITORIAL DUTIES.—We find the following paragraph in the "Life of Lord Jeffrey," recently published in Philadelphia by Lippincott, Grambo, & Co. We commend it to the consideration of our literary readers, and especially to such as may have adopted the erroneous idea that any person having the advantages of genius and a warm imagination, and who can write with ease and facility, is fully capable of performing all the duties required of an able editor. Alas! but few of those who have never experienced the care and anxiety, the wearisome labors, and mental and physical exhaustion that attend the selection and management of other men's productions, and the preparing them for the public acceptance, can well conceive the amount of literary drudgery performed by an editor, who but seldom has the time, or enjoys the pleasure of inditing his own thoughts and his own views precisely in his own language:—

"Jeffrey's value as editor was incalculable. He had not only to revise and arrange each number after its parts were brought together, but, before he got this length, he, like any other person in that situation, had much difficult and delicate work to perform. He had to discover, and to train authors; to discern what truth and the public mind required; to suggest subjects; to reject, and, more offensive still, to improve contributions; to keep down absurdities; to infuse spirit; to excite the timid; to repress violence; to soothe jealousies; to quell mutinies; to watch times; and all this in the morning of the reviewing day, before experience had taught editors conciliatory firmness, and contributors reasonable submission. He directed and controlled the elements he presided over with a master's judgment. There was not one of his associates who could have even held these elements together for a single year. The merit of getting so many writers to forego the ordinary jealousies of authors and of parties, and to write invisibly, and without the fame of individual and avowed publication, in the promotion of a work made up of unconnected portions, and assailed by such fierce and various hostility, is due to him entirely. He acquired it by his capacity of discussing almost any subject, in a conciliatory spirit, with almost any author; by the wisdom with which his authority was exercised; by the infusion of his personal kindness into his official intercourse; and his liberal and gentleman-like demeanor. Inferior to these excellences, but still important, was his dexterity in revising the writings of others. Without altering the general tone or character of the composition, he had great skill in leaving out defective ideas or words, and in so aiding the original by lively or graceful touches, that reasonable authors were surprised and charmed on seeing how much better they looked than they thought they would."

MRS. DARLEY.—We have before referred to this lady—the student and the daughter of the venerable portrait painter, Thomas Sully—as the very best limner of children in the country. This lady has a peculiar tact of engaging the confidence of the little subject, of arresting the calmest attention, and at once securing a most perfect likeness of the unconscious original. We hope Mrs. D. is as fully patronized as she deserves to be by those who are desirous—as almost all parents are—of having a correct copy of their first editions.

PETITIONING CONGRESS.—Some evil-minded editor, in ridicule, as we presume, of the almost universal practice of petitioning Congress and the State Legislatures, on very trifling occasions, and sometimes asking for very silly and unconstitutional grants, has had the impertinence, to say the least of his conduct, to represent that "an old maid" has petitioned the first named honorable body to have her age changed. It is, indeed, but too true that, as a free people, we carry the "right of petition" to the highest extent of our privileges, and to the lowest depths of our humility. But the attempt to bring the practice into disrepute, by representing that an old maid had petitioned Congress to have her age changed, is not only a libel upon that excellent and amiable class of females, but implies a feebleness of mind in our people which could only be truly represented by misrepresenting "old maids." It is our good fortune to number among our very best friends many ladies who have passed the heyday of life, whose calmness, serenity, and dignity, whose cheerfulness and charity are always so apparent, that we feel convinced that they have little to regret in the past, and no apprehensions whatever about the future. To many of them, we believe the approach of age is so gentle, that they seldom notice the changes that come over them, and therefore have no desire to avail themselves of any change that Congress might be able to make, being long since convinced, no doubt, that Congress seldom makes any changes for the better.

Perhaps we shall be laughed at by some of our readers for this exhibition of our respectful feelings, on a very trifling occasion, in favor of "old maids." The fact is, we never witness any attempts at wit and sarcasm, at the expense of womanhood, without feeling somewhat annoyed, and more especially if those attempts are made in ridicule of unmarried ladies, of whom it has been correctly and beautifully said, that "the single state is no diminution of the beauties and the utilities of the female character; on the contrary, our present life would lose many of the comforts, and much likewise of what is absolutely essential to the well-being of every part of society, and even of the private home, without the unmarried female. The single woman is as important an element of social and private happiness as the married one. The utilities of each are different, but both are necessary; and it is vulgar nonsense, unworthy of manly reason and discreditable to every just feeling, for any one to depreciate the unmarried condition."

RESPONSIBILITIES OF BANKS.—One of our contemporaries suggests that "the banks should be made responsible for the redemption of all counterfeits of their own notes." "This," says another of our friends, "is a capital idea," and proceeds to illustrate it with the comment that "such a law would make the banks exceedingly careful to put out notes which could not be counterfeited successfully, thus saving vast amounts annually to the poor, who are the sufferers generally by this species of robbery."

So, then, in order to save vast amounts annually to the poor, our contemporary would proceed deliberately to rob the banks, by making the banks responsible for the ingenious villany of counterfeiters. What more the banks can do than they have done, to protect the public from loss, we do not know. We presume, however, that the public authorities could do much more than has yet been done, as well for the detection as for the punishment of counterfeiters. Be that as it may, such a course as has been proposed would, indeed, be to compel the innocent to suffer for the guilty, and would, at the same time, legalize a new system of responsibilities, which, if carried out to the extent which would be applicable, would revolutionize all the business, social, and even religious relations of society.

Let us make the attempt to trace this proposition to its legitimate consequences, by a moment's reflection. Let us suppose that a dishonest man commences any business whatever, and that, in order the more successfully to impose on the credulous, he very nearly, though not completely, represents the face, form, and voice, the habits, manners, and sometimes even the name of a man of honor and integrity, engaged in the same profession; let us suppose that, finally, because imitation has not been altogether complete, the rogue is detected and his frauds exposed; and, when that is done, let us ask with what show of justice or propriety we could demand of the person whose name and character had been assumed, to account for the losses sustained through the counterfeit? Again, if a man manufactures a machine, in imitation of one which an inventor has been careful to take out a patent for, and succeeds in passing off his imitation for the original, with what face would you attempt to hold the patentee liable for damages? In our opinion, you might as well expect to compel religious and other societies to repair all the wrongs done, and all the impositions practised by their hypocritical and worthless members, who may have counterfeited the principles and actions of the true members and professors; or you might as well hope to hold manhood, or womanhood, or society in general amenable for the crimes and roguery perpetrated by cheats and vagabonds, merely because cheats and vagabonds happen to bear a very near resemblance to the rest of the human race. In fine, no better means could be adopted for the elevation of crime and the protection of dishonesty, than those would be which should transfer the responsibilities and the consequences of guilt to the innocent, honest, and industrious members of society. There is a great deal of counterfeiting carried on in the world, but it has not yet been made plain that honest men should be made the victims of vice and villany. Bank-note counterfeiters are, when caught, sent to the penitentiary. Let them be kept there until they pay those whom they have swindled out of the proceeds of their "hard labor," the State deducting all necessary expenses.

TRIPS ON THE SCHUYLKILL.—We take so much pleasure in our own excursions on the Schuylkill River, that we even take pleasure in referring to them from our "Arm-Chair," which we do in order that our city readers, and friends visiting from abroad, may be induced to accompany us, and enjoy the beauty of the scenery presented along its banks. Above all, we would advise strangers visiting Philadelphia to make the Schuylkill a point in their suburban excursions. In passing up the river on the steamboats, after leaving Fairmount, you have some of the most delightful and picturesque views that can well be imagined. On the margin, and turning along at the foot of the hills that line the river shores, you have in full view the railroad, with a train of one hundred cars or more; the canal, with boats noiselessly pursuing their voyages from and to the interior; the common roads, alive with carriages bearing happy parties from the city; and, in all, comprising a scene of life and beauty which cannot be equalled even by the scenery along the Hudson. There also, you have views of many splendid mansions, to which our opulent citizens can now resort in perfect safety, as the ague, so much dreaded in former years, has entirely disappeared; and, among the rest, is the cottage which was once the residence of Thomas Moore, and in which he wrote his celebrated farewell to the Schuylkill.

But what renders the scenery on the water and on the shores more beautiful and interesting than all, are the crowds of innocent and joyful children, who, full of life and loveliness themselves, add greatly to the life and loveliness of all around. Many a parent, during the past summer, can testify, as well as we, to the beneficial effects which resulted to their little ones from an occasional trip on the River Schuylkill.

WATER COOLERS.—J. S. Clark, 322 Market Street, makes the best water coolers to be found in this city. We have tried those of other celebrated manufacturers, but have found them far inferior to those manufactured as above. We have one in our office which we purchased some time since, and such is its superiority over all others that we give this notice unknown to the manufacturer; and, singular as it may seem to many of our brethren of the press, it is a notice absolutely brought forth by merit only. The great superiority of the cooler is that, with less ice, you can have cold water for a greater length of time.

THE FREAKS OF FORTUNE.—A curious incident took place recently in London, showing how singularly diversified are the fortunes of persons of the same family. On the same evening that the Countess of Waldegrave was giving a splendid entertainment to a select number of the nobility and aristocracy of that city, her brother, young Braham, the inheritor of his father's vocal powers, was giving a concert to a party made up of somewhat different materials. Who shall say which of the two was the happier, or which of them was the more rationally or usefully employed, the sister or the brother? We hope our republican readers will not all send in their opinions by the same mail.

PARVENU SOCIETY.—It appears that a society has recently been formed in Paris which promises to give to the world a new order of nobility, or, at least, of aristocracy. According to its regulations, the right of membership is always to be established upon undoubted testimonials of the applicant's having attained his elevation in the arts, sciences, in literature or in politics, in the army or navy, simply by the force of his own genius, and independent of the patronage of rich or powerful family connections. In fact, it is an effort to form an aristocratic society of talent out of the poorer classes, and to place industry, genius, and virtue on a par with the meretricious aids of wealth, without the possession of which, industry, genius, talent, and virtue are thought to be too frequently driven to the wall.

Now, for our own part, we confess we are not in favor of any form of aristocracy, believing that an aristocracy of poverty, in which the noble poor would become the exclusives, or an aristocracy of talent, in which the supremacy would be given to individuals of a class of merit, would, after all, effect nothing for the amelioration of society. The moment that one association sets itself up against any other association, even if it be against the tinsel wealth, or against titled pretenders, it falls into the same error of exclusiveness, and the same folly of pretension, which has rendered its opponents ridiculous in the estimate of all sensible minds. After the poor men of genius and talent, etc., have formed themselves into an association, which sets up its aristocratic exclusiveness against the aristocracy of wealth and titles, then we shall have, in all probability, an association of laborers or of mechanics, and associations of various grades, according to the professions of the members, all formed one against the other, all contending against aristocracy, and all as exclusive in their principles and pretensions as the original after which they have been compelled to copy. Thank Heaven, as we believe, there is no use for such associations in this free country! Industry, genius, and talent are always sure of their reward here, while those who have no other resources but the wealth hoarded by their fathers, no other reliance but the social or political distinctions of their parents, are daily seen falling into neglect and decay.

Receipts, &c.

TO MAKE GERMAN CAKE.—Mix well together a pound and a half of finely powdered loaf sugar, two pounds of well-dried flour, and a few caraway seeds; make it into a stiff paste with the whites of three eggs beaten in a little milk; roll it out very thin, cut into shapes, prick, and bake upon buttered tins.

TO MAKE YEAST.—To one large teacupful of split or bruised dry peas put one pint of boiling water, cover it closely so as wholly to exclude the air, and set it in a cool oven or by the side of the fire for twenty-four hours, when it should have a fine froth on the top. A tablespoonful of the water is the proportion (in a warm climate) to one pound of flour. Yeast thus prepared is very generally used in Persia, and the writer has employed it in India for three years with success.

STEWED OYSTERS.—Strain off the liquor from a dozen and a half of fine oysters; thicken it with flour and butter; add a tablespoonful of cream, a teaspoonful of mace in powder, and a very little salt. As soon as you have well mixed these, pour them into a stew-pan and put in the oysters. Shake the pan over the fire, but do not let the sauce boil, or the oysters will be hard.

POT AU FEU.—This is by far the most wholesome of all soups. Take three pounds of good rump of beef, of any part free from bone and not too fat; put it in an earthen fire-proof pot, with three quarts of water, one large carrot, two turnips, two leeks, a head of celery, and one burnt onion; season, and let the soup boil slowly, skimming it from time to time, for at least five hours; then strain it through a fine sieve, and pour it over thin slices of bread to serve. The meat and vegetables make a dish which is afterwards served. Thus cooked, the beef becomes tender and juicy, and is excellent cold.

A HAM has an excellent flavor boiled as follows: Preparatory to cooking, soak it well in vinegar and water; then boil in water with some heads of celery, two or three turnips, five or six onions, and a handful of sweet herbs. Put the ham in cold water, and allow it to heat very gradually. One of sixteen pounds will require four and a half hours.

REMEDY FOR CORNS.—Take equal portions of mercurial and galbanum ointments; well mix, spread on a bit of leather, and apply to the corns morning and evening.

SEAL ENGRAVERS' CEMENT is common brick-dust and rosin melted together in an earthen pipkin. With this, the handles of loose knives and forks may be fastened.

TO RESTORE IVORY.—To bleach a card-case, expose it to the sun in a close glass shade, previously washing it in spirits of wine and water, with a small quantity of soda in it. Allow it to dry very slowly in a cool place before exposure to the sun. But, under any circumstances, carving in ivory is apt to split, and become unglued. For an ink spot, try a little salt of sorrel.

TO MAKE GOOD BARLEY WATER.—Choose the best pearl barley, boil it for a few minutes, then throw away the water and add fresh, in the proportion of a pint to an ounce of barley. Boil quickly, and then let it simmer for an hour; strain and sweeten; flavor with lemon, or according to taste.

MARKING INK.—Nitrate of silver  $\frac{1}{4}$  oz., hot boiled water  $\frac{3}{4}$  oz. When cooled a little, add gum water 1 oz., and a little indigo to color. The preparation is made: carbonate of soda 1 oz. to 1 pint of boiled water; color with cochineal or indigo. 2. Without preparation: Nitrate of soda  $1\frac{1}{2}$  drachms to  $\frac{3}{4}$  oz. of water. Add as much of the strongest ammonia water as will dissolve the precipitate formed on its first addition; then further add, gum water  $1\frac{1}{2}$  drachms. Writing executed with this ink turns black on being passed over a hot Italian iron, or on being held to the fire.

A LOTION FOR WEAK EYES.—Twenty drops of laudanum and five drops of brandy in a wineglass of water. Apply three times a day as warm as the eye will bear it.

NANKERNS will keep their color if washed as follows: Put a large handful of salt into a vessel with a gallon of cold water; put the articles in, and let them soak twenty-four hours; then wash in hot lye, without soap, and without wringing.

PARTICULARLY ADDRESSED TO LADIES.—Dining in gloves is a vulgarity, and not allowable under any circumstances.

The white azalea is an emblem of purity and temperance. The white rose expresses, "I am worthy of you." The myrtle, "Friendship and Love." Orange blossom, "Chastity."

Centre-Table Gossip.

TABLE-TALK.

Do any of our lady friends take a note of the vast variety of topics that is introduced—and naturally, too—in the course of an evening's talk, when some three or four friends have met? If they have not, it will be a novel amusement, which we recommend them to try. We give a list that really was pencilled from an ordinary evening's chat—six persons being clustered around the pleasantest centre-table we know of in this city: "Weather—Boston—Spain—French—Dr. Jenkins—John Smith—Modesty—Caps—Gas Light—Weather—Savages—Lawyers—Flowers—Apple Orchards—Albums—Bouquets—Manners of Gentlemen—Caps—Queechy—Railroads—New York—Industry—Caps—Sea-Sickness—Washing—Needle Books—Economy—Mercantile Library—Jane Eyre—The Cat—Major Jones—Cold Weather—Christmas—Snow—Quarrelling—Sewing Materials—Peaches and Cream—Elephants—Knitting—Gloves—Jealousy—Craig's Riding School—Polkas—Coal—California Settlers—Twelve Acquaintances discussed—Relations," etc. etc.

This is about one-third of our list, and the precise order in which the subjects were introduced. And this reminds us to suggest the importance of cultivating conversational talents—for it is as much a talent, and as much to be improved by cultivation, as a taste for music or drawing, and often gives as great pleasure. A disposition to talk, and a command of language, are the foundation in all cases; but this may degenerate to mere garrulity or gossip, that wearies or disgusts the listener. Our sex are fatally prone to this, and, on the contrary, they have ever been distinguished as brilliant conversationalists. In cultivating this excellent gift, a refined taste in the choice of both delicate and forcible words and expressions; a well-stored and observing mind; and politeness that can bear defeat in argument, or contradiction in statement, amiably—are all brought to bear. The topic is to be suited to the company—never suffering scandal or egotism to intrude, either in fact or in narrative. Exaggerated forms of expression, or vehement gesture, should be discarded, though animated and varied expression adds much either to the force or grace of what is spoken. And, again, variety of topics should be at command, as well as facts and illustrations, and adroitly brought forward when the interest begins to flag—not pushed into notice, but quietly and naturally introduced. As an entertainer, it seems to be the duty of every lady to study the subject as much as possible, that many a weary hour or dull guest may be saved from lagging by the swift wings of agreeable and sparkling conversation.

MUSICAL EDUCATION

We are often asked, What is the best age to commence with a music pupil? some being under the impression that no child can understand the first principles before the age of ten; others thinking even that quite too early, and that nothing is lost by waiting until a young lady applies in serious earnest to the work of school education.

As regards the first, one of the most correct performers that we know, both as to time and expression, is just ten years of age. She had practised nearly through the very difficult method of "Bertini"—which is a sealed book to many older hands—and plays compositions of six and eight pages, not as an automaton, but with style and apparent feeling. Her mother has been her only teacher, and commenced her course of instruction at first only as a pastime. Gradually, the lessons came to be half an hour in length, seldom more, so that the child was not wearied with her "new play." We have tried the method with great success on a little pupil in our own family—weariness being a great drawback to the advancement of any study, as it almost always becomes disgust in the end. After a time, an hour, but never more, may be given morning and afternoon to practise with advantage. Advanced players who are studying difficult music rarely limit themselves as to time, but we are speaking more particularly of children.

If it is possible, they should not be allowed to practise alone for a year at least, as bad habits are easily formed, and may annoy the pupil through a long course of study. We shall give other hints under this head from time to time, as music is becoming so important a branch in female education.

MODERN VARIATIONS.

ONE of the most entertaining books of the season is, without doubt, "Thackeray's Book of Snobs," a volume of "Appleton's Popular Library." Like all the satire in which this clever writer indulges, it has its philosophy, which, if sometimes harsh and severe, is never wanting in truth. Thackeray is not one of those authors who "state in one line, and retract in another;" he is always in earnest, almost always in the right, and does not hesitate to shoot at any folly, be it visible in court or commons. As one of the best things, we quote his description of the modern popular variations—some one has called their authors "the old-clothes men of music"—wherein an insignificant air of four or five lines is made to do duty through six or seven pages.

"For the performance of 'Gettin' up Stairs,' I have no other name but that it was a stunner. First, Miss Wirt, with great deliberation, played that original and beautiful melody, cutting it, as it were, out of the instrument, and firing off each note.

"When she had banged out the tune slowly, she began a different manner of 'Gettin' up Stairs,' and did so with a swiftness and fury quite incredible. She spun up stairs; she whirled up stairs; she galloped up stairs; she rattled up stairs; and then, having got the tune to the top landing, as it were, she hurled it down shrieking, as it were, to the lower floor, where it sank in a crash, as if exhausted by the breathless rapidity of the descent. Then Miss Wirt played the 'Gettin' up Stairs' with most pathetic and ravishing solemnity, plaintive moans and sobe issued from the keys; you wept and trembled as you were getting up stairs. Miss Wirt's hands seemed to faint, and wail, and die in variations: again, and she went up with a savage rush, and clang of trumpets, as if Miss Wirt were storming a breach; and, although I knew nothing of music, as I sat and listened with my mouth open, at this wonderful display, I wondered the windows did not crack, and the chandelier start out of the beam, at this earthquake of a piece of music!"

THE PERILS OF A CROSSING.

We give our young lady readers a paragraph from a popular modern writer, leaving them to "point the moral:"—

"I hardly know a more interesting sight than that of a young lady going to school on a wet day, with books to carry in one hand, and an umbrella to sustain in the other. To see the struggles she makes in such circumstances to keep her skirts from dragging in the mud, or the patience with which she submits to their unavoidably doing so, and to think of the sad condition of her lower extremities all the time—to reflect, moreover, that all this trouble and suffering could be avoided by merely having skirts of a sufficient, but not over-sufficient length—presents such an affecting picture of evils voluntarily encountered and heroically sustained, as but rarely occurs in the course of human life. It is justly held as a strong proof of patience, that you should calmly submit to be spat upon or have mud thrown upon you by some infuriated crowd; but here is a gentle creature who literally goes out every day to endure the certain contact of these nuisances, and comes home to dinner not in much better plight than one who has sat (unpopularly) in the pillory for an hour. I really must give such martyrdom the meed of my admiration; and the more so, that I feel myself, under the hardening effects of worldly common sense, totally unprepared to go through such hardships without some useful end to be served by it."

RESPONSE TO THE AUGUST POETICAL ENIGMA.

We have received a very clever poetical answer to this enigma, in which the writer very naturally considers that "take a wife" would be the advice which the affectionate aunt would, on most occasions, administer to her nephew; but still it is not exactly the thing in all cases, as will appear from the following correct and clever solution:—

MY AUNT'S ADVICE.

When my aunt, to her mansion on MULBERRY GREEN,
In the best-natured manner that ever was seen,
Invited me down, with my friends, to partake
Of the best that her house and her larder could make,
Of course, our "day's shooting" extended to four,
Nor then had we yawned, or cried out "what a bore!"
For the country is pleasant, with "birds in the hand,"
With wine, horses, servants at constant command.
Such dogs! and we used them, from pointer to setter,
My dear relative's wish carried out to the letter;
For how beaming her smile, and how kindly her tone,
When she said, "Pray consider them all as your own!"
So I mentioned one day, as I smoked my cigar, Balanced just on the top of her best china jar—
"You see, I'm not backward to do as you say—
In fact, I have thought of prolonging my stay."
A smile full of meaning then instantly beams,
As she answered so coolly, "Indeed! So it seems!"

No wonder I blushed, as I mounted my horse,
And, to hide my vexation, dashed over the course;
But then came the ditch—that inglorious fall,
With the mud, bruises, laughter, the torn coat and all;
And those very same words, as her smile once more beams,
But now in good nature, "Indeed! Sew its seams!"

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"LOUTERA" will find care of white crape shawls very necessary. It is not well to keep them in the box in which they come, as it is a great deal of useless trouble to fold them so closely. Miss Leslie tells us that a cake of white wax, laid in the box or drawer in which they are kept, will grow quite yellow, while the crape remains white. They should be folded and laid away as soon as taken off, as every contact with dust soils them, especially the fringe, which is apt to get dingy from tralling on the sidewalk, or brushing a dusty wall. It is true, they can be cleaned, but they never look so well again, having that washed and stiffened appearance peculiar to colored silks, and the embroidery is pressed quite flat. The usual charge for cleaning, which is done by most dyers, is $1 50.

We agree with "JEANNETTE F." that white, during the summer season, is the most ladylike and suitable dress a young girl can wear. We know of some who keep two bodies, made differently, to one skirt, which may be tacked on, thus making a little change. Swiss muslin is almost too thin for the street, cambric or grass cloth is more suitable, while Swiss muslin and tarleton are the best evening dresses. Nansook cambric keeps its color better than any other material, save linen or grass cloth; a grass cloth will outlast two of ordinary cambric, though more expensive at first, and always looks well.

The patterns for embroidery inquired for by "L. N. C.," can be had in the city. Copies of all those that have appeared in the "Lady's Book" can be had by applying to the publisher.

"MRS. L." will find the following a very good plan to keep iron goods, such as coal-scuttles, etc., from rusting: Heat them gradually, and then brush them over with common linseed oil, which is decomposed by the heat, and forms a thin, but very firm coating of varnish, which is quite impervious to water, and, unlike paint and Japan black, does not chip off. Garden-chairs, railings, and everything exposed to the action of the outer air, should have two or three good coatings of paint.

"THE HEAD OF OUR FAMILY" shall have the most unexceptionable receipts for dressing salads in our next. We condole with her on the numerous onerous duties which devolve upon her in her mother's absence, and shall be happy to render her any assistance in our power. Salad dressing requires not only directions, but judgment and practice; but it is an accomplishment every lady should possess. Rose vinegar is a novelty in salads, and, by some, thought very desirable. To every quarter of a pound of rose leaves, add two quarts of good vinegar; put it in a large jar, cover it firmly, and leave it to infuse, till a fine tincture is obtained, when strain for use.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

Having had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editor of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Bridal wardrobes, spring and autumn bonnets, dresses, jewelry, bridal cards, cake-boxes, envelopes, etc. etc., will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq., who will be responsible for the amount, and the early execution of commissions.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Levy's or Stewart's, bonnets from Miss Wharton's, jewelry from Bailey's, Warden's, Philadelphia, or Tiffany's, New York, if requested.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION PLATE.

We would call attention to the artistic and picturesque grace of this whole engraving, making it quite as valuable as a picture as a representative of tasteful fashions. Had it been called "The Zoological Garden," it would have been noticed as a clever picture; for the half shy, half delighted air of the child, the admirable figure of the negro nurse in her striped Madras handkerchief, and the pleased interest of the young mother, make a charming group. As it is, it combines, with this grace, southern fashions for October.

The first figure has a walking-dress of dark noir d'antique, a very rich silk, which requires little trimming; the front is cut out in a diamond pattern, to display the richly wrought white cambric robe beneath. Sleeves demi-long, with undersleeves edged by a broad lace falling over the hand. White silk bonnet, with an edging of spotted blonde, and a wreath of clematis buds and leaves. Light mantle of India muslin, with a rich fall of lace. As our southern ladies walk but little, this will be recognized as a carriage costume.

The child in the arms of her sable attendant is attired in a richly wrought cambric dress. The mantle is of pink cashmere, simply trimmed with a ruché of pink silk, and may be fastened by a broad pink ribbon sash around the waist. The hat is of leghorn, with a small plume on the right of the brim.

The nurse has a brown stuff dress, white apron and neck-handkerchief, with a brilliant Madras twisted about her head.

WOOD-CUT.—ROBE DE CHAMBRE.

This is intended for the invalid receiving visits in her room, or may be worn as a summer morning-dress with perfect propriety. It is made of white jaconet, or thick Nanook muslin, very full, the front breadth being continued up to the shoulder, and fastened by a girdle around the waist. The trimming down the front is a broad ruffle, gathered in the centre, both edges being finished by a scallop of button-hole work; a collar of the same should be tied by a bow of thick Mantua ribbon, some plain color. Loose sleeves, finished by a double ruffle to correspond. This is one of the most simple and tasteful dresses we have seen.

CHITCHAT ON PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR OCTOBER.

As our warm weather continues later than in New York even, this is the transition month in Philadelphia, as far as styles are concerned. There are no fall openings of millinery as yet, though several are announced for the next two weeks; therefore, straw bonnets with silk linings, replacing those of crape, and trimmed with rich ribbons, are most generally seen. The ribbons are of deep colors, with a bright spot, figure, or stripe enlivening them. For instance, a black ground and small crimson palm-leaf, royal purple with a bright green spot, etc. etc. The varieties of style in which bonnets are trimmed defy all description; some have simply a wide, rich ribbon passed over the brim, and confined at the top with a knot or band of straw, spreading out at the ear, and drawn in again to tie beneath the chin. If the straw is fine, and the ribbon wide and thick, this, with a cape of the same, is all that is necessary.

There is another style, the ribbon brought very far forward in a point on top of the bonnet, a second band of ribbon follows it, only not inclining so far forward. Others, whose white trimmings of the summer are still in good order, consult economy and taste at the same time, by ornamenting the cape by two rows of narrow velvet ribbon, in some bright color, as cherry or bright green, with innie bows to correspond. However, each town and village has its own prevailing fashion in this matter, and we leave it to the taste of our readers, with a general rule to avoid, as far as possible, a multiplicity of bows and dangling ends.

The winter dress goods are not fairly in the market, although the shop windows are full of bright mousselines, and silks, and merinos. There are many novelties among them; for instance, several styles of figured mousseline de bagé, on the plain brown ground: it is "something different," it is true, but, as a general rule, figured goods of any description are never as invariably ladylike as those in solid colors. There is also a chené de bagé, in several shades of brown, shot with green and dark crimson. This still continues to be a favorite fabric, and more of the plain shades, and of a heavier, better quality, are imported than ever before. They are trimmed either in scallops of button-hole stitch, or with several rows of narrow velvet ribbon. The Albanian, or Albanese robes, are mousselines of dark, rich, plain colors, with the skirt printed in bright wreaths of flowers, or bands of stripes, at the distance of several inches apart, having something the effect of flowers d disposition. The top of the skirt, waist, and sleeves is plain. Others have only a border in gay stripes or plaids, like the chintzes of the past season. The richest broadsides are d disposition, which, as we have before explained, means that the skirt, waist, and sleeves are worn separately, the pattern of the skirt being a much larger figure than the rest of the dress. We shall speak more particularly of silks and other dress goods in our next. Merinos, of every shade, are imported, and of exquisite fineness; they will be worn as much as ever, with a trimming of velvet ribbon. There is a beautiful new shade, which we can only describe as a red stone color, looking as if the last had been washed over by a soft shade of carmine.

The pretty fashion of aprons has by no means gone out, though they are not worn as full as they have been. Fine white cambric, or cross-barred muslin, are the nearest for morning-dresses, though many wear black silk, with capacious pockets. For silk, only two breadths are now used; the second one is divided so that the seam may not come in the centre. The waistband is, of course, shorter than in the robe aprons, only reaching little more than a third of the waist. Two or three narrow gaugings make a neat finish for the top. In dress aprons, small outside pockets are worn, the corners rounded and put on with a cord, and a ribbon run across the top, meeting in the centre in a neat bow. Nothing is prettier than a small handkerchief just peeping from one of these pockets. Aprons are also made of rich watered and moiré silks, very short, and edged with two rows of narrow velvet. The corners are rounded. The pockets placed sideways are also trimmed with velvet.

We must defer further information of the making up until our next number, as we have been requested to give the new styles of riding-habits. There are two, which differ very little, except in color and material. The one is dark brown merino, made with side bodies and a short basque, rounded in front, from the waist back to the hip. The sleeves are rather loose for a tight sleeve, and turn back in a broad cuff almost to the elbow; a close cambric undersleeve is worn beneath; a linen collar, and embroidered neck-tie of black silk, finishes the dress. The other is very nearly the same, in light habit cloth, of a deep shade of gray.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.

PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER, 1852.

EVERYDAY ACTUALITIES.—NO. VI.

ILLUSTRATED WITH PEN AND GRAVER.

BY C. T. HINCKLEY.

A DAY AT THE BOOKBINDERY OF LIPPINCOTT, GRAMBO, & Co.

HAVING given our readers, in our last article, an insight into the mechanical operation required to set the types and print the sheets of a book, we this month take them to one of the largest publishing houses in the country, that they may know something of the manner in which books are bound and circulated through the Union. We are enabled to do this through the courtesy of Messrs. Lippincott, Grambo, & Co., who allowed us the privilege of examining their extensive range of rooms, a general idea of the labor performed in which we shall endeavor to give in the following pages.

When we received the consent of the senior partner of the firm for this privilege, we expected to find much that would surprise us, but were not prepared to find so vast an amount of business performed with so little capital invested. We were completely lost in the labyrinth of the establishment, as we passed through room after room, so peopled with workmen engaged in their respective branches to which the rooms were devoted. Our intention, at first, to give a description of the labor employed in the establishment, was enlarged in the method of sewing, tapes being concluded, so far as we are able, to make our readers acquainted with the general machinery of a large publishing house, hoping it may prove as interesting to them as it was to us. We will first describe the

BOOKBINDING DEPARTMENT.

After the sheets are finished in the drying-room, as described in our last, and are pressed, they are sent in bundles to the bindery, where they are opened and given out to the girls employed to fold them.

When the whole of the impression has been folded, each sheet is laid out in a row, in piles of one hundred. The folder then takes one from the top of each pile, and, placing them together, they form the printed matter of a book. The copies thus collected are knocked evenly together, and put into a hydraulic press, between steel boards, in rows of two deep, and as many along-side of each other as the boards will hold, for the purpose of compressing them into a compact form. If the work be newly printed, care must be taken not to allow it to set off, as the fresh ink has a tendency to make an impression on the opposite page, as was generally the case with new books when compressed by the method, which was to beat them on a large smooth stone with a cast-iron bell-shaped hammer weighing twelve or fourteen pounds. This required a skill so as to compress or condense the sheets without marking them with the edge of the hammer, and to give the paper a smooth polished surface. This process was very much improved some years ago by a rolling-press, consisting of two iron rollers mounted and set in the usual way at any distance apart. A number of sheets, varying from four to fourteen, according to the size, being placed between two tinned iron plates, are passed through the rollers. This method not only renders the paper smoother than by hammer-beating, but the compression of the book is one-sixth greater, a very desirable object, inasmuch as the book-shelves will contain nearly one-sixth more books. These superior effects are also produced by the rollers in one-twentieth of the time required by the hammer. This method is now adopted for books that have been printed some time, in which the ink is properly set, and also for books that require rebinding.

After pressing, rolling, or hammering, each book is collated, to see that all the signatures run properly, and the plates, if any, are inserted in their proper places. The waste leaves are added at the beginning and end; the back and head are then knocked up square, and one side of the book is placed on a pressing-board of the size of the book itself, and another similar board is laid on the upper side of the book, taking care to let the back of the sheets project about half an inch between the two boards. The workman then grasps the boards firmly between the thumb and fingers of the left hand, and lowers them into the cutting-press, which consists of two strong wooden cheeks c c, connected by two slide bars b b, and two wooden screws a a. The use of the two guides on one of the cheeks will be explained hereafter; but it may be remarked that when these guides are not wanted, the press is turned completely over, so that these guides may be at the bottom, and out of the way. When the sheets are lowered between the cheeks c c, the press is screwed up tight by working an iron bar in the heads of the screws. The man then passes a tenon saw across the back of the sheets, so as to make a number of grooves, according to the size of the book, for the reception of the cords or bands for holding the threads in the sewing, and also for securing the boards which are to form the side covers. The number of bands depends upon the style of binding or method of finishing the book; board books, or books bound in cloth, have only two bands. But in the better descriptions of binding, 32mos. sometimes have three bands; 18mos., 12mos., 8vos., and two-leaf 4tos., have four bands; royal octavos and whole sheet 4tos., five bands; and folios from five to seven bands. In addition to these grooves for the bands, a groove is also formed at each end for the catch or kettle stitch. Supposing a book with two bands is to be sewed, it is taken to the sewing-press,* which is a stout flat board b b, SEWING-PRESS.

containing an upright screw s s at each end, supporting a top rail r, which rises and falls on the screws by means of nuts n n. Attached to this rail are several cords corresponding with the grooves sawed in the back, and these cords are secured by being fastened to brass keys, one of which is here shown, passed through the aperture in the bed of the press, while they are tightened by turning the nuts n n, so as to raise the top rail. The book to be sewed being placed on the board b, with the title uppermost, the sewer first takes the fly-leaf, or end paper, if such there be, or sheet A of the book, and turning it over so that the title-page may lie with its face on the board, she places the grooves in it so as to correspond with the stretched strings or bands. She then passes the left hand into the opening of the sheet, and with the right pushes the needle through the right hand kettle-stitch: the left hand receives the needle, and returns it out through the first groove above the stretched string; the right hand draws the needle completely through, and passes it through the same groove below the stretched string; the left hand takes the needle and passes it through the second groove above the string, and the right hand returns it below the second string; and lastly, the left hand returns the needle through the bottom kettle-stitch. The thread is then drawn so as to lie evenly in the angle of the sheet, a small piece being left projecting through the back at the top kettle-stitch. The sewer then takes the second sheet, and turning it over upon the first, inserts the stretched strings into the sawed grooves at the back.

* This press is arranged for three bands; but, for the sake of simplicity, the description refers to two bands.

She passes the needle through the bottom kettle-stitch, and proceeds as before, passing the needle in and out round the bands, only proceeding up the sheet instead of down. When the needle comes out through the top kettle-stitch, the thread is drawn tight, and secured by tying it into a knot with the end projecting from the first sheet. These two sheets form a sort of foundation for the subsequent sheets, which require a less elaborate sewing. Two sheets are taken at a time, and the thread is drawn through the grooves of each alternately: passing the needle through the top kettle-stitch of the lower sheet; then out above the first band; then into the upper sheet below the first band; then out above the second band; then below this band into the lower sheet; then out through the kettle-stitch of the lower sheet; and, lastly, this lower sheet is secured to the previous sheet by passing the thread round its lower kettle-stitch. Two more sheets are then taken, and in this way the sewing is continued with great rapidity. When one length of thread is nearly exhausted, another is taken, and joined to the former by a knot. This kind of sewing is called up and down work, and presents the following arrangement in the sheets of the book—the sheets showing two threads and one thread alternately, as the reader will find by examining any boarded book, or a book bound in cloth. When the sewing of one book is completed, the thread is secured at the kettle-stitch, and cut off. A second book is sewed upon the first, upon the same bands, until the press is full. The bands are then loosened by slipping off the keys, and the books are separated from each other by severing the bands, care being taken, for some descriptions of binding to be noticed hereafter, to leave a sufficient portion of the bands projecting on each side of each book for the purpose of securing the boards.

There are various kinds of sewing, depending on the size of the book and the style of the binding. The commonest kind of sewing, such as we have attempted to describe, is called sewing two sheets, or up and down work. In some kinds of fine binding, the sheets are sewed all along, and only one at a time; that is, the thread is passed round every band, so that, supposing there were three bands, the sewing in every sheet would present the following appearance—

Where it is an object to make the book superior and stronger, fine silk is used, instead of thread. To prevent injury to the book by sawing grooves for the bands, which cause the book to wear out much faster—for the holes thus made gradually enlarge in size until the book falls in pieces—a method of sewing is adopted without any groover, tapes being used instead of strings. The only holes made in the sheets by this method are those of the needle, which is passed in and out above and below the tapes, and the sewer forms her own kettle-stitch with the needle. This kind of sewing is shown above. It requires more care than the former to keep the sheets even, and when well done the effect is excellent, for by this plan the book opens flat at any part, the fold of the sheet starting up fully to view when the book is opened. This style is called flexible binding.

When the books are folded and sewed, they pass from the sheet-room to the forwarding-room. The forwarder first prepares the linings for his book, which are made of fancy or enamelled paper; then, if the book is a stout book, for instance a quarto Bible, he makes his boards, which is done by pasting two or three pieces of the proper size together and pressing them. His linings are then pasted on his books, which are first glued, then rounded and backed. The operation of rounding the back is done by placing the book on its flat surface, and drawing the back on one side, gently tapping it with a broad-faced hammer: the book is then turned over upon its other surface, and the operation repeated, by which means the back is brought into a convex form. Each book is then placed separately between a couple of boards, with the back projecting, and is thus lowered into a screw-press, which is screwed up tight. The workman then, by a succession of blows, applied somewhat obliquely up and down one side of the back, depresses that side, and causes a ridge to project over the board. He then repeats the operation on the other side, by which means the back is depressed at the two sides, and is raised in the middle; a few gentle taps in the middle, and some finishing blows at the sides complete the rounding, and its effect is to form the side edges into a concave groove, the concavity of which corresponds with the convexity of the back, and the grooves formed at the two boundary lines of the back allow the boards or side covers of the book to fall in so as to present an even surface at the sides.

The books are now to be placed in thin cases, and the outside fly-leaf being pasted to the boards, the books are built up between wooden boards, the backs of the books outwards, and projecting; and this pile is placed in what is called a standing-press, consisting of a well-oiled iron screw working in a nut, and the upper bed of the press is screwed down with great force, by means of an iron bar inserted into the inverted head of the screw. To economize labor, the pile, which constantly varies in size, is made to rest upon a number of boards, which diminishes the distance between the upper and lower beds of the press. There the books are left for some hours to undergo the requisite compression.

The mill-boards, which form the solid substance of the cases, are supplied to the binder in sheets, varying in size from 17½ inches by 14½, for the smaller sizes, up to 41 by 31 inches. The binder cuts up these sheets to the required size with great precision and rapidity, by a machine constructed for the purpose. It consists of an iron frame, one-half of which is covered with a horizontal plate, or table, for holding the board. At the inner edge of this table is a holdfast, or bar of metal, extending across the frame, moving on a hinge at the opposite side, and connected by a hinged lever on the near side with a treadle. The lower surface of this bar is furnished with file teeth for holding the board fast. Just beyond this holdfast is a straight, fixed bar, with a square cutting edge, and by the side of this is a curved bar, or knife, mounted on an axis, and balanced by a weight at the further side, and furnished with a handle at the near side. The edge of this curved bar forms, with the fixed bar, a pair of shears for cutting the boards. The gauge being set at the proper distance, the board is placed flat on the table, and its rough edge is first cut off. This is done by sliding the board along until the edge just projects beyond the shears. The man then puts his foot on the treadle, which brings the hold-fast down, and secures the board; he next forces the curved blade down against the fixed blade, which cuts the board to a clean, smooth edge. Then, releasing the board by lifting his foot off the treadle, and raising the knife, he passes the board up to the gauge, which is furnished with an edge or chamfer, and stops its further progress: the board is cut through as before, the piece falling into the bin beneath. In this way, the board is cut up into three or four long strips, the other long edge, nearer the left hand, being cut off while it rests on the table. A number of boards being thus cut up, each strip being sufficient for two, three, four, or more boards, the strips are again passed through the shears, and cut to the proper size of the books they are intended to cover. Such is the precision of this machine that, when all the pieces thus cut are piled up and knocked together, they appear to form a solid parallelepipedon, with perfectly sharp edges, in consequence of all the pieces being of the same size.

The cover of the book may be of leather or of cloth; but, in either case, it is ornamented at the back and sides with a pattern inclosed within a figured or flowered border, with different toolings and devices for the back, and blank borders for the gilt lettering or other ornaments. These are stamped, by means of certain presses, varying in power, with the material to be embossed. The dies are formed either of steel or brass, the latter being the more common. The dies are cut or chased by hand; but, for some patterns, consisting of regular curves, they can be more economically turned in the lathe, in which case brass must be used. The counter die, for embossing, which is attached to the upper bed of the press, is formed by the man who manages the press, by gluing a number of pieces of mill-board together, and gluing them to the surface of the lower bed. By turning the arms of the press round, the lower surface of the mill-board is brought up with amazing force upon the metal die, and the softer material takes the impression of the bolder. The man then cuts and trims and adjusts the counter die, every now and then taking impressions on paper; and when he is satisfied with his arrangement, he proceeds to emboss the leather pieces cut to the proper size for covering the book.

Every piece of leather requires to be passed three times through the press—once for the back, which is of course of a pattern different from that of the sides, and once for each of the sides. If the two sides are of the same pattern, the man embosses all the leathers on one side—say the left—and then, re-adjusting the die, embosses the other side.

Cloth covers are embossed after the boards are inserted. The cloth, which is now consumed in such enormous quantities in bookbinding, is manufactured for the purpose. The cloth is cut up to the proper size of the cover, an extra quantity being allowed for the overlap within the boards. The cases are then made up, with great rapidity, by two men, one of whom covers the inside with a layer of glue, and then places two mill-boards in their proper position on the cover, so as to form the stiff sides, the space between the two depending, of course, on the thickness of the book. He then turns the cover over, and rubs the cloth firmly down with a cloth-rubber, shaped something like the stone muller used in color-grinding. He then tosses the cover to a man, who places a strip of paper or canvas along the inside of the back between the two boards, and then folds down the projecting edges of the cloth over the boards, smoothing them down with the edge of a flat piece of stick with a blunt point at each end, and then drawing the point of the stick down the boundary lines between the back and the sides. The two men complete about one hundred covers in an hour.

When the covers thus formed are perfectly dry, they are embossed and gilt. The ornaments which are simply produced by pressure are called blind-stamping, and, when done by hand, blind-tooling; while the gilt ornaments or lettering are called gold-stamping or gold-tooling. The machines employed in both descriptions of ornament are called stamping-presses, and they do not greatly differ, except in power, from the fly-press already described. The ornamental pattern for the back or sides is cut out in a thick plate or block of brass, and is fixed in the upper bed of the press by means of a dove-tail joint. This upper bed is furnished with a cavity containing a gas-pipe, with a row of jets for heating the die by conduction of heat from the upper bed. The cloth covers are inserted within metal rules, which serve as a gauge, by a man who sits before the press, while another man turns round with great strength a large fly-wheel, whereby the lower bed is brought up a few inches upon the case in the upper bed, and embosses the impression. When the cases are to be gilt, it is first prepared with a thin layer of ovalbumen or white of egg, called glair; after this, the gold-leaf is laid on and the case is then passed through the press as before.

In gilding, the designs are often made up of many different small stamps, according to the taste of the stamper.

As the covers are removed, they are taken by a boy, who wipes off the superfluous gold with a piece of thick rag, which thus gradually absorbs the fragile leaf, and, in the course of two or three months, this rag is so valuable that it is sold to the gold refiner, who burns it in a covered crucible, and thus recovers the precious metal.

The covers thus formed are next adjusted to the books, which we left in the standing-press. The covers are secured to the books by pasting the waste leaves on each side of the book to the boards, and to conceal this arrangement as well as the uncovered parts of the boards, and also to give a neat finish to the book, some colored paper, called lining paper, is pasted in. The books are lastly put into the standing-press for a few hours, and may then be said to be finished.

We have thus traced the various processes concerned in binding a cloth-boarded book. They consist of gathering, folding, and sewing the sheets; gluing and rounding the backs; cutting the edges; making, embossing, and gilding the covers; and, lastly, securing the covers to the books. In a large establishment, such as Messrs. Lippincott, Grambo, & Co., the whole impression of an octavo work, consisting of one thousand copies, can be done up in cloth in the course of about ten hours; in which case, however, the cloth covers are prepared a day or two before, all the information required for the purpose being the thickness of the book, which is known by stating the number of sheets contained in it. The title and the style of ornament, color of the cloth, &c., are also determined. A thousand covers or cases can be prepared in one or two days. The book itself can be folded, stitched, glued, and rounded, the edges trimmed, and the book mounted in cases and pressed, all within ten hours. This is, indeed, an extraordinary example of the power of numbers of skilful workpeople, and the effect of a refined system of division of labor.

The method of binding thus far described applies chiefly to those books which are issued in large numbers, and whether the covers be leather or cloth, there is no very great difference in the methods adopted. In leather bindings, such as in Bibles and prayer-books, the edges, instead of being trimmed with a knife, as before described, are cut through with a plough, so that there is no necessity for cutting open the book before reading it. The book-binder's plough consists of two upright cheeks of wood c c, connected together by a wooden screw s, and a couple of guides b b, fixed into one cheek, and moving in square holes in the other. The screw passes through both cheeks, so that by turning it round in one direction the cheeks are brought nearer together, and, in the contrary direction, moved farther apart. Into one of the cheeks at k is fixed a cutting-knife, a double-edged, pointed blade, of which two forms are given. The book to be ploughed is placed between a couple of boards in the press, with the edges projecting as much as is required, and one of the cheeks being placed in a groove of the press, the point of the knife is brought up to the book, and moved backwards and forwards against it, the workman at the same time giving the handle of the screw a twist, which advances the knife forward until the cutting is completed. The white edges of the book in common binding are then sprinkled, whereby that speckled or mottled effect is given to them, which prevents them from soiling, and also improves the appearance of the book. This is done by mixing up some colored chalk, umber, Venetian red, or ochre, in a little size and water, and dipping a brush into the mixture, so as just to wet the bristles; the man holds a long piece of wood a few feet over the books, and beats the bristles of the brush against it, which causes a shower of minute drops of color to rain down upon the edges of the books, a number of which are set up together for the purpose. When the desired effect is produced on the top edges, the books are turned over, and the bottom edges are treated in a similar manner, the man turning up one of the finished edges, every now and then, to see that he is producing the same tint of color at the bottom as at the top. The side edges are done in the same way, and the color is fixed by placing the books in the bench-press, and passing an agate burnisher over the edges, which produces a high polish, and prevents the color from being removed by ordinary use. By these simple and expeditious processes, a cheap and useful ornament is added to the books.

In the better class of binding, as in whole-bound calf, gilt lettered, with raised backs, the boards are added after the gluing and rounding of the backs, for which purpose the sewer leaves small projecting pieces of string bands. The boards being cut to the proper size, a couple of holes are made in each board with a brad-awl, opposite each band, and the string being passed through these holes is secured with glue. In a book of three bands, the boards are held by six strings, three on each side, and each board is, of course, pierced with six holes. The books are then put into the standing-press for a few hours, after which the edges are ploughed, the boards being slightly depressed below the edge to be cut off, the strings allowing them a little play before the cover is put on. In cutting the side edges, the workman takes care to preserve the concavity produced by the rounding, for which purpose he flattens the back by passing a flat tool between the edges of the boards, which are allowed to hang down loose, and the back. He then places the book between a couple of boards, grasps it tightly, and withdraws the flat tool: then lowers it into the press, and screws it up tightly. By thus flattening the back, the edges become flat also, and when they have been ploughed, and the book is taken out of the press, the back starts into shape again, and the side edges become concave. After this, the edges are gilt or marbled. In gilding, the book is secured between a couple of boards in the press, and the edges being covered with glaire, a layer of goldleaf is laid on, and the agate burnisher, being well rubbed over every part across the edges, secures the goldleaf, at the same time giving it a beautiful polish. When all the edges are thus gilt, paper is wrapped round them, to prevent them from getting soiled. When the edges are to be marbled, the books are sent out to the marblers, who produces the effect of marbled paper by the following contrivance: A trough about two inches deep is filled with clean gum-water. Various colored pigments, ground in spirits of wine, and mixed with a small quantity of ox-gall, are thrown upon the surface of the gum-water, and disposed in various forms with a quill and comb, according to the desired pattern. This being obtained, the book is tied between two boards, and the edges being dipped into the trough, the floating colors become attached; cold water is then dashed over the edges, which sets the colors, and brings them out clear.

The book is now ready to receive the headband, which serves as a finish to the top and bottom of the sheets, and assists in keeping the upper and lower parts of the hollow back in shape, when the book is closed. The book, still in the rough boards, is fixed by one corner in a small portable screw-press, and a small strip of mill-board, placed on edge at the back, is secured by passing a needle and thread two or three times between the leaves through the solid back and over and under the small strip; the thread, which is generally of silk or cotton, two or three colors being sometimes used, is then twisted or plaited over the strip, and when about a third or one-half is covered, it is further secured by a few stitches through the solid back. The plaiting or covering is then completed, and is secured as before by sewing through the back. The superfluous portions of the strip are then cut off. This description of headband is called worked; a commoner description, called stuck-on, is a piece of striped or colored linen, inclosing a piece of cord, stuck or glued to the back of the book. The bands or raised projections at the back of the book are formed by gluing strips of mill-board, leather, or cord across them.

The book is now ready for covering. The leather may be calf, or morocco, or Russia; but, whatever the leather, it is carefully chosen, so as to be free from blemishes, and of the proper size; being placed on a flat board, with the rough side up, the edges are pared thin with a sharp knife, so that, in turning them over the board, they may not bulge out into unsightly projections. The leather is then damped, and covered with paste, and applied to the book, a few simple tools being used to smooth it down and press it into shape, to square the edges, and to raise the bands. The leather is neatly turned in at the top and bottom, and then folded over the headbands. When the sides and edges are nicely smoothed and squared, the bands at the back are raised, and the spaces between them depressed, by working them with a bone paper-knife, and during all these manipulations the man every now and then moistens the leather with a bit of wet sponge. When the leather cover is properly arranged, the marbled or other lining papers are inserted, and the book is put into the standing-press for a few hours, after which it is ready for tooling. But in some descriptions of binding, a good effect is produced by having distinct lettering pieces, of a different color from the general binding. These are cut out separately, thinned at the edges, and attached by means of glue. The blind-tool ornaments of the book are put on by means of pieces of brass, cut into the desired pattern and shape, and mounted in handles as below. If a long line, plain or figured, is to run up the sides of the book, it is cut upon the periphery of a disc of brass, moving upon a central axis, and furnished with a long handle, which the man rests against his right shoulder, holding the tool near the axis; in this way, he can roll the tool the whole length of each side of the cover. All these tools are heated at a gas-stove, a great improvement on the unwholesome charcoal brazier formerly in use. The small tools are pressed down with an equable force in those parts of the cover where they are wanted. Gilt tooling is produced by covering the parts to be gilt first with glaire and then with goldleaf, and then pressing the hot tool upon the part thus covered. On wiping off the gold with a rag, that part of the gold only is attached which came in contact with the hot tool. Lettering is performed commonly by a set of lettering tools, each letter of the alphabet being cut out in brass, and mounted in a wooden handle. Letters, numerals, &c., are kept of different sizes; but for words in common use, such as "Holy Bible," "Atlas," &c., tools are kept, with the whole word or words cut in them. When the ornaments, lettering, &c., are complete, the book is finished off with polishing-irons, of various shapes and sizes, one of which is shown. These are heated, and passed over the leather, and also over the marble lining-paper, &c.

We have thus gone over the principal processes concerned in binding a book. A few years ago, a method of binding by means of caoutchouc cement was patented, by which the operations of sawing-in, sewing, rounding, and the use of glue are dispensed with, and, instead of leaves attached by thread stitches at two or three points, they are agglutinated securely along their whole length. This plan is admirably adapted for binding engravings, maps, manuscripts, and collections of letters, which have little or no margin left at the back for the stitching. The plan has been thus described: "After folding the sheets in double leaves, the workman places them vertically, with the edges forming the back of the book downwards, in a concave mould, of such rounded or semi-cylindrical shape as the back of the book is intended to have. The mould for this purpose consists of two parallel upright boards, set apart upon a cradle frame, each having a portion or portions cut out vertically, somewhat deeper than the breadth of the book, but of a width nearly equal to its thickness before it is pressed. One of these upright boards may be slid nearer to or further from its fellow, by means of a guide-bar, attached to the sole of the cradle. Thus the distance between the concave bed of the two vertical slots in which the book rests may be varied according to the length of the leaves. In all cases, about one-fourth of the length of the book at each end projects beyond the board, so that one-half rests between the two boards. Two or three packthreads are now bound round the leaves thus arranged, from top to bottom of the page, in different lines, in order to preserve the form given to the back of the mould in which it lay. The book is next subjected to the action of the press. The back, which is left projecting very slightly in front, is then smeared carefully by the fingers with a solution of caoutchouc, whereby each paper-edge receives a small portion of the cement. In a few hours, it is sufficiently dry to take another coat of a somewhat stronger caoutchouc solution. In forty-eight hours, four applications of the caoutchouc may be made and dried. The back and the adjoining part of the sides are next covered with the usual band or fillet of cloth, glued on with caoutchouc; after which the book is ready to have the boards attached, and to be covered with leather or parchment, as may be desired."

Blank-book binding is a distinct branch of the trade, and is applied to the binding of every description of account-book. The paper is first folded and counted into sections, which in foolscap generally consist of six sheets, and, above that size, of four sheets. These are sewed upon strips of vellum, three strips being usually applied to foolscap folio, and a greater number for larger sizes. In sewing account books, waxed thread is used, as being stronger. After sewing, the first ruled leaf at each end is pasted to the waste paper, and the marble lining paper inserted. The back is then glued, and when dry, the fore edge is cut and the back rounded, a rounder back and consequently a deeper hollow being given than in printed books. The two ends are then cut, and the edges greened. The headbands are ~~worked~~ <sup>marked</sup> on a slip of parchment, as before described. Strong pieces of leather are then glued at the top and bottom of the back and between each of the vellum slips. A hollow back is produced by soaking in water a strip of mill-board about a quarter of an inch wider than the back of the book, and gluing it on both sides; it is then placed on a sheet of paper, and a roller corresponding to the curvature of the back of the book is placed upon it, and the strip is worked backwards and forwards on the roller, which gives it the semicircular shape. It is then dried hard before the fire. Another method is to paste a number of pieces of paper in succession upon a roller, and when thoroughly dry it is cut down lengthwise, thus forming two semicircular backs. Thin sheet-iron is sometimes used for the purpose. The milled boards are then cut out for the side covers. In large books, it is usual to glue together two thin boards for each cover, and to insert between them the projecting ends of the vellum bands on which the book is sewn. The first and last fly-leaves are pasted to the boards, and after they are squared, the curved back above described is placed on, and a piece of canvas sufficient to extend over half the width of the book on one side to the same distance on the other side, is glued on the boards and over the back: this holds the hollow back firmly in place. The book is then ready for covering, for which purpose the leather is carefully pared all round and neatly put on. The covers are usually sheep skin and Russia, white and covered; smooth and rough calf. If the cover be rough calf or sheep, it is dressed with pumice-stone and a clothes-brush. Smooth calf are glazed and polished as in printed book-binding. Rough calf or sheep books are usually ornamented by passing a very hot roller round the edges and sides of the cover. Large books are always furnished with bands of Russia leather worked on sometimes with thongs of vellum, which add to the strength of the binding, and have a neat appearance.

The finer qualities of binding, embracing Turkey morocco, calf, and Levant, in the various styles of richly gilt, massive panels, and velvet, embossed with rich ornaments, have many processes which are very attractive and curious to the uninitiated. The operation of embossing and illuminating the edges, which is carried to great perfection in this establishment, gives the book an ornamental and attractive appearance, of which it is impossible to give our readers any idea. In this process the books are fastened firmly in iron presses, the edges are then scraped smooth as polished ivory, they then receive a coat of size upon which the goldleaf is laid. When the leaf is dry, it is polished with agate and blood-stone burnishers. Should the book be designed for the panelled or more costly style of binding, the edges are then ready for embossing or illuminating, the process of which we have before described. Finishing, as its name denotes, is the last process of this interesting art. The finisher must possess a high order of taste and skill. The mechanical execution of his branch is much the same as in embossing, with the difference that he must work out his designs with the aid of the small tools we have before mentioned, upon leather. The difficulty he has to overcome, and the nicety with which his work must be done, can be understood, when we inform our readers that one pattern which we saw in this establishment had five thousand impressions of different tools upon its surface.

To enumerate all the various styles of decoration as practised in book-finishing, would be a very difficult, if not an endless task, as some styles are purely local, while others again do not stand the test of progressive and improving taste, and consequently are but of short-lived duration. There is scarcely any style of ornament which book-finishers do not more or less practise. The improved artistic knowledge of the workmen of the <sup>19th</sup> ~~18th~~ day, and the proficiency attained by them in the execution of designs, are far ahead of anything in the art of bookbinding which has preceded them.

The earliest specimens of bookbinding extant were executed in the monasteries by the monks, anterior to the invention of printing, which procured for such the name of the monastic style, the monks being then the principal composers, copiers, and bookbinders. The monastic style is distinct and peculiar in itself, the sides of the book being closely filled up with what is technically called blind tooling, that is, the impressions made by the tools are not put in gold; this style is much sought after in the present day, especially in the binding of old books. But this is not the only description of finishing to which the monks of that period applied themselves, books being then, as regards price, of great value compared to what they are in the present day, and it was consequently considered that nothing could be too costly in decorating the exterior. Hence arose those beautiful specimens of needlework of various colored silks—gold and silver ornaments—stones, and jewels of great value, with which the books of that period were frequently richly ornamented.

The next in rotation is the Aldine style, which derives its name from Aldus, a famous printer and bookbinder who flourished in Italy in the fifteenth century. This style (like the monastic) is principally in blind tooling, but of a lighter and more open description of tools, and more fancifully arranged.

After that period, books becoming more plentiful, book ornamentation consequently took a more extensive range, as we find, before the expiration of the sixteenth century, great improvements had taken place in book-finishing. A style of intersected patterns were much in practice, which, for beauty of design, are rarely surpassed, added to which, the Elizabethan style of ornament was much in use; since then, down to the present day, various styles one after the other have been adopted, all tending to the perfection of the art, and the advancement of the profession in general.

We have given as near as we could an idea of the process of Bookbinding, as conducted at this establishment; but there has been much that we could not insert without going more into detail than our readers would wish. They can form some estimate of the labor required, from what we have recorded above, and we here offer our thanks to all concerned, for their attention to us in our progress through this establishment.

The publishing house of Lippincott, Grambo, & Co. was established over thirty years ago, by John Grigg, Esq., who, with his partner, Hugh Elliot, Esq., and others who now continue in the firm, conducted the business under the firm of Grigg, Elliot, & Co., until a few years back, when J. B. Lippincott, Esq., who had been in the same business for a number of years, purchased the interest of Messrs. Grigg, Elliot, and, in connection with the junior partners of the old firm, established the present one. The reward which enterprise and industry always bring has favored this house from the commencement. Increasing yearly in its business, it has gradually extended its sphere until it is at present one of the largest, if not the largest, publishing house in the United States, employing in its operations over half a million of dollars. In their store can be found not only their own publications, but those of every publisher in the country; as they receive all new books of other houses as soon as published. It is this fact, together with the vast number of books issued by themselves, which renders their business one of such immensity, and makes their establishment the great jobbing book-house of the country.

To enumerate their various publications would require a volume; they embrace all subjects, scientific, historical, scholastic, &c. &c. Over one hundred books have been issued by them since the commencement of the year, many of which are among the most costly ever issued in the country, comprising, amongst others, the "Waverley Novels," in twelve volumes; "Schoolcraft's Work on the American Indians," elaborately illustrated with steel engravings by the best engravers in the country; "A Series of Histories of the States in the Union;" "Ancient Christianity," by Dr. Coleman; "Shakspeare," two editions, one in four volumes, and the other in one volume; and a numerous variety of school books, &c. &c. They have the stereotype plates of over two hundred volumes of standard works, from which they are constantly working off editions to supply the current demand. These plates cost, originally, over $250,000. Of Bibles and prayer-books alone, they sell upwards of fifty thousand copies yearly, and most of them bound in a superior style. In this class of books, their sales are next to those of the American Bible Society, Mr. J. B. Lippincott having, for years before he purchased an interest in this firm, enjoyed the reputation of being the "Bible publisher of the country." Of one book which they are now publishing, they issue daily one thousand copies bound in cloth, and this independent of the other works they have in press. After the above facts, our readers can well imagine why we were struck with astonishment at what we saw, and will, with us, give this house a just meed of praise for the enterprise they exhibit.

In the store, a view of which we give on the top of the first page, and which will doubtless be recognized by hundreds of booksellers through the country, are employed twenty-seven clerks, who have each their separate departments to attend to. This room is also used for packing; the books, after being sent down from the second and third story rooms, are here boxed up and sent to their various destinations. The second and third story rooms of the building, and one room in the adjoining one, are occupied as salesrooms, each one of which is about twenty feet wide and one hundred feet long. In these rooms, a view of one of which we give on the first page, there are thousands of volumes on the shelves on both sides of each, requiring the services of a number of salesmen to attend to the duty of selling and recording orders. In looking at the vast number of books in these salesrooms, and the constant operations of sending off and replacing, which pass before you, the wonder is what becomes of them all, and what an amount of capital is required to keep up such a stock. Few persons, without seeing, would believe the thousands of books which are daily sent from these rooms to every section of the New World, and to portions of the Old.

The fourth and fifth stories of their own and the adjoining buildings on each side are occupied as their bindery, and comprise eleven rooms. In them are employed over two hundred hands, men and women, in the various branches of bookbinding which we have previously described. Some of the finest specimens of binding ever executed in this country have been done in the establishment of Lippincott, Grambo, & Co., among the more prominent of which is a Bible which was presented to Queen Victoria.

In the semi-annual "trade sales," or sale of books by auction to booksellers only, which takes place in New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, Messrs. Lippincott, Grambo, & Co. are one of the largest depositors and purchasers; and their enterprise and capital furnish employment to over five hundred workmen in their own, and other establishments employed by them.

A SKETCH OF LIFE IN THE GRANITE STATE.

BY E. JANE CATE.

CHAPTER I.

A RICHER evening twilight never visited us mortals than that which flooded Lake Massabesic, and the woods and rocks, and sands of its borders, as townward there came in sight a carriage "covered with the dust of travel." Here, the waters gleamed and flickered "like molten gold;" a little farther, they lay tranquil and blue as heaven; while away there, across those tracts of silver, dark as ruin they went, stealing back amongst the woods and hills, into the deep-reaching coves. Sail-boats and row-boats were near and far; just where they ought to be, to make the ensemble perfect, our travellers thought. Close beside the road were lambs, large enough, and old enough, to be sure, to stand there quietly and observe the travellers, and chew their cuds and look contented, as they saw their mothers and the cows do; but they did no such things. They too seemed to have delight in all the beauty and quietude there was in the place; and went running up and down the high rocks, trying which could run the fastest, leap the highest, and the most gracefully. Often there were heard grumblings among the old dams, over all this indecorum and danger of breaking their necks; but the lambs only danced up to them, gave them a roguish look, jumped over their backs, and then went dancing back to their sports.

"Look there, sister," exclaimed the gentleman, involuntarily stopping his horse. He pointed, as he spoke, to a little cottage amongst the shrubbery and trellises, and you could not know what else, it was so closed about by primeval oaks and vines, and trees of minor growth.

"There must be comfort there," sighed the lady.

"Yes, and genius, if it does work with hard hands," replied the gentleman, still looking at the house.

"The Malones—you remember hearing Mrs. Lane speak of their near neighbors, the Malones. That must be their house. Just look across the lake, among those hills, brother. Heavens! how dark and strange! Let us get out of the carriage."

They alighted, "both stood, both turned," and looked long, here and there, and all around, upon a scene of contrasted sublimity and loveliness, before which proud man might well bend his spirit in humble adoration, as that gentleman did; before which woman might grow faint with a thousand conflicting emotions, veil her face, and at last weep, as that lady wept. Farmer Brown passed them on his way home from the field, with his boys and his long team. He, too, looked away to the lake and up to the sky. Wonder—if he gave thanks that his lot had been cast in such pleasant places? No; he said something about wind east, storm to-morrow; and, when he was beyond the hearing of our travellers, "More grand company going to Squire Lane's, of course," said he; and, "Yes, I'll warrant it," answered his sons.

And going to Esquire Lane's they were; for, still walking before the horse, they turned down the broad, straight avenue, which terminated in a carriage sweep, before a large farm-house. No one was without the house; but within our travellers heard sounds of laughter and running.

"Mrs. Lane's laugh; how like a child's!" said the lady. "See, as she said, no bell. She told you to 'pound three times with the head of your stoutest cane;' didn't she?"

"She told me so many strange things, I have forgotten. But—" rap, rap, rap, very softly went his cane on the door. No one came; but they heard a voice within say, "Was it you I caught, hus? or was it you, Frank? or what was it? Ah! I must have you in blinders yet, Mr. Lane."

"Heavens! then, if I don't have some revenge!"

"Ah, that was not fair, Mr. Lane. I caught you then, fairly. I will tell you. When we get you into blinders, you will take such long, straggling steps, so queer, we shall almost die laughing at you; and when you stoop to catch your little wife, she will go bounding over your head."

Rap, rap, rap, rap; and just at that moment Mr. Lane was caught, it seemed, for fresh laughter came, and now a manly voice chimed in loudly. The travellers entered; but then a difficulty in crossing the hall presented itself; for rugs, chairs, and foot-cushions had been brought out from the parlor in preparations for the game. The lady gave a spring, and landed fairly within the parlor, in full view of the little party.

"Who? what? Heavens, Miss Bartlett! let me shake you to pieces! let me kiss you forty times! Where did you come from?" Thus spake the mistress of that house, the prettiest, rosiest, happiest creature you ever saw.

"From Concord at sunrise," answered Miss Bartlett, as soon as she could speak for kissing and being kissed.

"And your brother, Miss Bartlett?" said Mr. Lane.

"Yes, go, Mr. Lane. I am positively wild with delight; and I shall kiss him too. I will, husband mine," she added, running after him to the door. "I will, if it does make you provoked, and jealous, and—"

She did kiss him; and then turning, she again flung her arms around Miss Bartlett's neck and kissed her. As Mrs. Lane said, her husband and her friend Fanny had only chances of slipping their words in edgewise, for all her vociferous rejoicings and questionings. The gentlemen went out together to adjust baggage, etc.

"That is right, Fanny, you dear. Do be putting things in order. You see, Miss Bartlett, it is just as I told you it would be when you came to my house. I told you, you know, that, when you would promenade our rooms, you would be obliged to make your 'winding way' among mops—'wisely kept for show,' only—and every kind of rubbish. Yes, Fanny; do fix my hair a little: my curls are in my eyes, ears, and mouth. I wonder that Mr. Lane—old bachelor as he was, and so very particular—I wonder that he never scolded me; I think the good soul does try sometimes; but he soon finds himself laughing, and that is the end of it."

As Fanny arranged Mrs. Lane's hair, she said something in her ear about "fatigue, refreshment."

"Refreshment? Ah, yes; excuse my forgetfulness. You must be almost starved."

Miss Bartlett denied this; they had refreshed themselves at Hooksett, only a few miles back.

"Oh, but you must have some tea immediately," said Mrs. Lane in a pleading tone, and with her hand already on the door latch, "if it be only to taste our strawberries and cream, and—what, Fanny? my dress torn out at the gathering? 'Tis Fide's work: he is always sure to tear me, if he tears anybody. He jumped to my head once while we were at play, and caught his mouth full of curls. But tea, Miss Bartlett; you will have some tea with us?"

"Yes, for I am hungry; and this I haven't been before for weeks. This air from the lake is so cool on one's head, and so clear and exhilarating for one's breath, it makes one feel strong and—"

"And hungry; that is good!" interposed Mrs. Lane.

"Stay, Jeanette, and let me go," said Fanny, lifting her finger in laughing defiance to Mrs. Lane, as she passed her. Mrs. Lane kissed her hand after her, said, "You good one!" and then sat down in her cushioned arm-chair and began rocking herself vigorously as she talked.

"You are pale, Miss Bartlett," Fanny said, "and thin too. Say, Mr. Bartlett, has she been falling in love with uncle Gates? Has she?"

Miss Bartlett parted with some of her pallor; her brother said, "Well, I don't know."

"What does Mrs. Jones say? She always sees right through all such matters, so that people have come to regard her as a sort of oracle."

"Well, singularly enough for her, she seems in this case determined to be 'reputed wise for saying nothing.'"

Fanny appeared at the door, beckoning Mrs. Lane.

"Yes, you dear," said she, leaving her chair. "Well, if this lasts, people at Franklin must certainly wear blank faces awhile, and go round saying, 'Another star has gone out.'"

The lively woman had talked herself out of the room; and together she and Fanny went singing across the dining-room. She returned in the next minute.

"Fanny is having things her own way to-night. This gives us both pleasure. I am so indolent! and she—young, unused to labor, graceful, and refined as she is—is yet so careful and busy! She will make the best wife in the world to the man who is so lucky as to secure her; he 'who gets gold gets trash,' comparatively. She assists me in so many ways!" added Mrs. Lane, with filling eyes. "She makes our home so elegant and tidy; extraordinary, such as you have seen, excepted. She knows my one greatest failing, and is, I think, determined on helping me to work out a radical cure. Well, we shall see, as Mrs. Jones says. You know Professor Grimes gave me a little order, constructiveness, and caution, and at the same time prodigious destructiveness."

"An unlucky combination, certainly," said Miss Bartlett.

"Yes, indeed, for a housekeeper. But I can see that I have gained already; so that, although not of the famed class nascitur non fit, I believe that one day I shall be able to manage with tolerable clearness."

"Then how happy you will be! You have such a noble husband! such a beautiful, beautiful home!"

"Yes; I assure you I have wept many times, thinking how unworthy I am of them both. I found but little trouble as long as I was at home: for if I did things wrong, the dear patient Emily was always at hand to put them right; and I just made sport for people. Even mother laughed at my accidents. She little knew the trouble it would make me some day, or how it would plague husband. He is so kind! I think he would lose patience with me, if he didn't half pity me. Fanny's bell. I must quicken husband and your brother's movements. They are stopping at every other step as they come." She met them in the yard, took her husband's hand, Mr. Bartlett's arm, and hurried them into the house.

"You don't know anything about how glad I am, Mr. Lane!" said she, looking up in his face with intense delight in her eyes. "They are the first visitors we have had to stop a good long time with us since we were married, you know, except Fanny. And we shall all have such good times, especially in the rainy days, when you can sit quietly with us in the house. I love those days. But chiefly I shall delight in making Miss Bartlett as healthy and fat as I am myself." Miss Bartlett's eyes filled at the hearty kindness of Mrs. Lane's tone and manner. Mrs. Lane's eyes also filled, ever and anon; but at the same moment she went on laughing. Mr. Lane's eyes beamed affectionately, and yet quietly on his wife; he again extended his hand with friendly warmth to his guests; and then his eyes wandered toward the dining-room.

"Ah yes, tea you are thinking of, Mr. Lane. Fanny would prepare tea alone; and now it is waiting." Mr. Bartlett turned his eye out again upon the glorious evening, before he was ready to be seated at table; and his sister bent her face to rose sprays which came far into the windows from the yard. Mrs. Lane rejoiced not a little over Fanny's elegant table; and especially she rejoiced over Miss Bartlett's appetite. She could never be satisfied tasting the biscuit of eggs, cream, and flour; the rich custards, so cold and so exquisitely flavored, as is everything sweetened with maple sugar; and above all, the strawberries and cream! Mrs. Lane made them laugh not a little in one way and another; and, as for herself, she felt every moment her heart actually leap up in joy over all the happiness, and sociability, and busy though soft jingle and clatter of cutlery, spoons, and dishes, which she saw and heard before her. They talked of Concord people, and the doings of the legislature from whose session Mr. Lane had just returned, of all they would do there at Massabesic while they remained; and then, although it was a half hour since they had left their spoons in their cups, and their knives and forks across their plates, Mrs. Lane poured them out more tea, and they made no objections. Fanny helped them to more plums, and Mr. Lane to pound-cake, which, up to this time, had been left untasted. When Mr. Lane had said "Cake—will you not take some cake?" and when Mrs. Lane had added "Surely, you will take some cake?" they had answered, "No, thank you; but, if you please, some more of your biscuit and strawberries;" or "another custard."

After supper was ended, late though it was, they walked down the avenue, along the border of the lake, at the foot of the high hills; and those who had lately been so loquacious and gay were now thoughtful and still beneath the moonlight and amongst the dark shadows.

CHAPTER II.

On the morning after the arrival of the Bartletts at Massabesic—but, then, I wonder who are the Bartletts? I wonder whether they are anybody? whether, after all, it is worth while writing about them? We can know about them by going to their archives, by which I mean, of course, those only archives which we Americans keep—fragmentary and scattered letters, diaries, day-books, family Bible perhaps, and perhaps a genealogical chart, title-deeds, wills, and sundry other documents; and sundry of their neighbors, together with the oldest inhabitant thereabouts. But this surely would be a wearisome and perplexing process. I know a vastly better and altogether practicable one; but its adoption would be such a daring innovation upon all respectable precedents! "I would be, to the common method of romancing, perhaps what Fulton's crazy steam-concern was to the mighty old white-winged ships of the line; and I verily fear that people, after they had looked on awhile sideways, would go off shrugging their shoulders, and muttering self-complacent things about folly, presumption, &c. &c.

"For a' that an' a' that," however, I will venture thus: I have a very dear friend, born on the same day and in the same hour as myself. "Sitting on the same stool, working both on one flower, on one sampler," both weeping when one wept, both laughing when one laughed, and so on, is the tale of our united life up to this day. We never differ at the very core of our hearts; but we have misunderstandings, quite lively quarrels sometimes, and then one pulls one way, and the other the other way. But mutual comprehension and forgiveness follow directly; and with the greatest complacency we say that, although the spirit is always willing, the flesh is sometimes weak; and hence we go wrong. She is of the Pensée family, my friend. You know the Pensées. Not to know the Pensées "argues one's self unknown;" and so it must be that you know the Pensées. A very ancient, honorable family, you know; very powerful, sometimes differing wonderfully the one from the other in their characteristic traits, but alike in this: the whole family are the most active or the most profound thinkers; whether naturally, or only habitually by way of giving significance to their name, cannot be specifically determined. Par parenthèse, it may be that some of my readers need to be told that Pensée, being interpreted, is thought, or fancy, or sketch.

My friend Marie Pensée is an intensely interesting being; she "centres in herself such strange extremes!" Now she is pale, cold, solemn, drawn to her utmost altitude, and stately as an empress, and you fear and worship her from afar; then blooming in her happy excitement, ardently affectionate, holding you in her arms, or sitting like a child at your feet; and you love her, love to lean your head on her and rest. Now she sits with great old tomes all about her, bending over them all day long, getting spine-ache and melancholy; then she goes through the house, yard, and garden, like one of the Graces, hiding your books and pen, making you try with her on the carriage-sweep which can run the fastest, full of all manner of happy and childlike frivolities.

She wears, in summer, white mostly. When she is in pensive mood, a robe of rich white merino, full, draping her feet, and heavily embroidered in cream-colored silks; when she is gay, a frock of illusion lace, with sleeves and skirt looped and festooned, one can scarcely see how, in delicate fresh flowers. In winter, she wears drab cloth and heavy jewelry when she is thoughtful; otherwise, black mostly, enlivened by the finest embroidery in collar, cuffs, and handkerchief. But in all her moods she maintains one peculiar attribute, a most wonderful prescience; one peculiar characteristic, a kind of lawless, and yet perfectly innocent eccentricity. She is Marie Pensée, and none other, at all times, with all people. And this chiefly, and because we harmonize so well, is why she is my chosen friend of all others.

She is very often at our house. When I sit at my table and write, she keeps quietly on the sofa behind me, employing herself in one way and another as her humor happens to be; and, in candor, I would never know what to do without her in this business of story-telling; because, of whatever I wish to know, she can usually inform me. She is so busy here and there! such a traveller! never fatigued, never in need of resting, and scarcely ever of sleeping. There is no house whose very penetrabilia she cannot reach. No human heart, when it is perfectly right and proper that she should enter, can shut itself effectually against her ingress; no human countenance can so mark itself that she does not say to me, He frowns, he weeps, and now he smiles again. This is surely a great, a responsibility-involving gift. So Marie feels; and she is careful to use it aright; in the love of her neighbor, in the love and fear of her God. Could she act unmindful of this fact one moment, that same moment herself and her power would be parted forever.

As my readers have no doubt conjectured ere this, my plan is to ask Marie about the Bartlett's. Perhaps she will attend to me not in the least. She is so in a habit of abstractions and mystifications, and then is still for hours, only turning leaves slowly as I hear her now.

"Marie dear, what are you doing, tumbling over those great books so long? And all those rocks! what can you be doing with them? even the commonest, granite, feldspar, and serpentine. One would think that by this day you knew enough about them, their formations, their depositions, their combinations, and all other of their ations."

MARIE. You repeat yourself, dearest, when you talk. But just look at this now. See how curiously they are packed together: pyrites—feldspar, rose and white—quartz, white and smoky—mica, black and white—and—

"Well, my good Marie—"

MARIE. Well, dearest, I have been studying about things all day. If professors would only agree sometimes, one wouldn't be at such a loss. But between the Huttonian and Wernerian theories, one is wretchedly perplexed. Look at this, please.

Think of things, of seams, strata, deposits, veins, and all such things, and then which seems most likely, that this earth was once melted by heat or dissolved by water? Hutton or Werner, which do you favor?

"Oh, indeed, I don't know. I just wonder and hold my breath over the one supposition and the other; for a moment, long, as I never long for anything else, to understand how it was; and, by that time, I have the heartache and am tired; therefore I run away from it all, saying, 'Who shall decide when doctors disagree?'"

MARIE. That is comfortable, if one can only do so; but—. You know what geologists say about primary, transition and secondary rocks. How do you suppose—

"Pray don't ask me, Marie! I don't suppose anything; I really don't know anything about it. I studied geology in the schools, you know; and really thought I understood it. But afterwards inquiries and doubts came. I read Lyell, Cleveland, Silliman, Bakewell, and everything else I could get hold of—almost made a shadow of myself—only to find it all the time growing darker and darker the farther I went, that is, in some points. Then I folded my hands to wait until the way is better lighted, or the guides are better agreed. I advise you to do the same; or at least to rest a day. You are so pale, your eyes are so large! I am going to pack away these old encyclopedias under the table, thus! You shall sit in this best easy-chair close by me, thus! Now we will have a pleasant time talking about people and things. Together we will make out a story illustrative of some good proposition in household, agricultural, or political economy; and will not this be a better deed, in these days of stumbling and inquiring, than just satisfying yourself whether this earth was baked or boiled?"

MARIE. Perhaps so; but please don't burlesque things in this way. What are you doing this morning, pray?

"Not much, it must be confessed. I have been thinking about Jeanette Eastman. You remember she married a Lane, a rich old bachelor, of Manchester. He fell in love with her, you know, seeing her in the lobby at the State House; and she with him, hearing him speak on the small-bird act, you remember."

MARIE. Yes indeed! and how people troubled themselves because they were so unlike; because he would marry her when she was so incorrigibly wild and careless; and because she would marry him when he was so old, dignified, and quiet; and how they opened their eyes on me when I tried to make them comprehend that the truest, heavenliest harmony comes not from striking with two fingers both on one key. Heavens! what insipidity there would be then! And what an insipid thing this married life would be, if, when the husband said fa, the wife said fa; and when the wife said la, if the husband opened his mouth just as wide, and said la. I couldn't live so! I would rather have storms and earthquakes; wouldn't you, dearest? wouldn't you rather have storms and earthquakes?

"I don't know, I am sure."

MARR. Well, I know. I have thought not a little about it; and I feel it more and more that I could never love one who was not unlike me, who was not greater or less than myself. There are plenty of agreeable men who are younger, thinner, or softer than myself. Those I could love with all my heart; but as mother loves you, I fear; and this would be entirely wrong, you know, between man and wife. Enough more are like me—just as tall, just as strong, just as firm. Heavens! I am in torture every time they come near me! I can't endure them! So the man that I love and wed must be prodigiously tall, prodigiously strong and clever, prodigiously old, prodigiously fat, or something of that sort.

"I presume so. Do you know what kind of a wife Jeannette made?"

MARR. Why, she went on improving. She still goes on improving, and there is no danger of such people. Here is a letter she sent to her family when she had been married six months. She says:—

"I must tell you how I succeed in housekeeping; for I know Em's good, kind heart has feared not a little for me; I know now, too, how much reason it had to fear. Thanks to my husband, thanks to Fanny, and thanks to Heaven, I am gaining day by day—slowly, 'tis true, but surely—in everything that goes to make the good, careful housekeeper. I say this in grateful joy; and I know you will rejoice with me. I used to be downright discouraged whenever I allowed myself to think of my fault. This was seldom, you know; for it seemed to me then that I never could be careful and prudent, like you, sister. But there was only wanting a motive to earnestness. This I have now, in love for my husband and in the sincere desire to be worthy of him, and not to give him pain. You all laughed at me at home—father, mother, you, and all. You were dear good ones. Never girl had kinder. But if you had lain on my shoulders the whole weight of all the displeasure you had reason to feel, then, you know, I really could not have borne that; and I should have set myself at work in earnestness and perseverance to be rid of my wretched habit. But I so loved to make you all and everybody laugh so heartily! 'A head full of mirthfulness and destructiveness,' you know Professor Grimes told me; and I believe it; for all I wanted to do was to see things going to ruin and people laughing at it. I was never so happy as when I had spoiled myself, clothes and all, unless indeed some one fell down with a peculiar awkwardness and made horribly discomfited faces about it.

"And now—ah, I might confess many recent sins of this sort! Husband is kinder than ever to me at such times: but sad, so that I half cry and kiss him in the next minute, and then all goes straight. I still love to put myself into bad plights, and I always shall; and if I do grow old, and have babies, I shall amuse them and myself and husband many a stormy day, and making full-moon faces at them; and putting on a queer cap or bonnet bent into all manner of shapes, and putting strange metamorphoses upon their little bodies. Husband likes sport as well as I do; I have ascertained this; that is, if it is not carried too far. He looks slightly sorry or anxious if I go one step too far—he has such a nice sense of propriety!—and is my 'thus far, and no farther.' So you see that, as I told you, he is just the husband I need: and I begin to hope that, as he often declares, I am just the kind of wife he needs. He is naturally so grave, so almost melancholy, and so busy at his work and studies!

"Tea is almost ready, dearest," Fanny says; and she gives me a loving kiss. The dear girl helps me like a sister. She is helping herself most, she declares; and, indeed, you would all be surprised to see how fresh and plump she is growing. She scarcely ever touches the piano; never embroiders of late; but works and walks here and there, and always upon the spring. In this way her spine is daily getting stronger and freer from pains. Bless her! This is what I say in my heart twenty times a day. The Bartletts too are darlings! so perfectly accomplished! and at the same time so cordial and lively! I assure you we are the happiest family in the world. And now I must go to my beloved ones, after I have said to the beloved ones at my other home, 'Ah, if you were only here, father, mother, sisters, brothers, to sit at my table! if I might pour tea for you all, and see your eyes brighter over my cooking, the world would not hold a happier child than your Jeannette.'

"9 o'clock. We have supped, and worked, and walked; and now soon we must go to our rest. We have had a busy day of it, all of us; and to-morrow we shall have one busier still; for there will come, before the sun rises, a troop of haymakers to help Mr. Lane. Then do you not think we will have some busy days? Yes, indeed. Every night we shall go to bed tired, but thankful; thankful that we can labor; thankful that labor is pleasant and healthful. Mr. Bartlett too is to put on thick gloves, and wide-brimmed hat, and work in the field; while early in the cool morning, Miss B., Fanny, and I are to go with wide aprons on, hair put smoothly back behind our ears, and in short sleeves, boiling pots full of beef and ham, and baking ovens full of bread and pies. Mr. Lane wants to hire a girl through haying and harvesting, we shall have so many work-people a part of the time; but this is so impossible, you know, finding a girl; for all the farmers' daughters that can possibly be spared are away in the factories. Besides, I should steadily decline, any way. I shall work no harder than he will; and Heaven help me to bear my full share of the burden and the heat of the day! I am delighted to work; to feel fatigue working for him, he is so good, so dear to me. God bless him! As Tiny Tim says, 'God bless everybody! God bless us!'

"Don't fail to come at the time you have promised. Tell Charley to see well to the snow-white gosling which is to be fatted for the Thanksgiving dinner. Tell Susan to be a quiet girl, and keep her drawers in order. Tell them all that Jeanette loves them. Tell them that, happy as she is in her new home, she yet finds her heart aching to see them; and believe me ever,

"Your own JEANNETTE."

"A dear good creature, isn't she, Marie? But I pity her, I am sure, with such a troublesome fault, and so painfully conscious of it."

MARIE. She would be the more to be pitied if she had the fault, and still was unconscious of it. Still it is best to feel for her, dearest. It is best to feel for everybody who has faults and who mourns over them; and this would be feeling for everybody that lives.

"Everybody does not—everybody has faults certainly, enough of them. But then some people care nothing about it. I know some people who have a thousand times worse faults than Jeannette's, who yet care nothing about it. Whenever you see them, they are upon the qui vive, flitting like butterflies, and mouths wide open in laughter."

MARIE. This is nothing. You never know how they feel in their still chambers. You never know how they feel at the very moment. Think if you never laugh and talk folly when you feel like sitting down alone and weeping over this same folly? when you long to go away and fall on your knees begging for mercy, for strength, and clearness to reach a nobler life, a higher comfort! And who of all those that look on your laughter and folly know this? Who but the great Searcher of hearts knows how much people everywhere suffer? Think what He said, dearest, and this was because "He knew what was in the heart of man." "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." He does not add, "If he seem good; if he seem sorrowful after going wrong; if he seem penitent;" but simply, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." What sublimity there is in this, when we think who and what our neighbors are! Have you never thought, dearest, how the whole life of the good Saviour was one unwavering, beautiful comment on this text! Wherever we see him, you know, there He was loving his neighbor, doing good to his neighbor, to the rich and poor, to the good Mary and the woman of Samaria, to the learned rabbi and the poor fisherman; for he saw the heart, and knew that all suffered in one way or another, and that all had need of kindness and love.

"You say what is true, Marie; and would to Heaven that we all, that everybody might feel this every moment! Then how kind and loving we would all be! How we would go taking people by the hand, looking them kindly in the face, saying, 'brother,' 'sister.' Then how the degraded would lift their heads! How their poor, dull hearts would be stirred, and what warmth and light would go round into the cold, dark, shut chambers of a soul here and a soul there! Heavens! I do believe, Marie, that every spot, every heart might be made light, and good, and comfortable, if only those who have so many candles burning under bushels, so much benevolence, so many good impulses in their hearts, so much love, so many kind words on their tongues—if they would only let them come out into the world, and spread and diffuse themselves. Ah, I mean to"—

MARIE. Well, dearest, after all, don't mount up thus. This is what you are often saying—I mean to. I presume you do mean to. So does everybody; but, pardon me, I never see any great thing that you do, that anybody does. You all mean to. Still, you all go on rocking in your easy-chairs, and so the kind word is never spoken. The poor creatures are never taken by the hand; nor do they hear it said kindly in their ears, Brother, Sister. Hence they go on, never thinking that there is kindness anywhere in the wide world; that in any heart they are thought of, cared for.

"Oh dear, yes, I know it is just as you say; and it is vastly too bad that there should be so much despondency in the world, such degradation, when just speaking and acting out the goodness there is in us would make people so hopeful, and so much better, too. I am sure I hope that I, for one, shall do better some day. But I want to ask you, Marie. Jeanette mentions the Bartletts in her letter. Were they?"

MARIE. The Bartletts, of State Street, Concord. Mrs. Jones's relatives, you remember.

"Yes, indeed; and how she was always talking about them, always losing herself amongst 'their cool verandahs and shady balconies, mazy shrubbery and splendid exotics, magnificent hangings of damask, chenille, velvet, and embroidery; their antiques and their marbles, limestone marbles, ruin-jasper marbles, and serpentine marbles; their ottomans, and taborets, and brioches; carriage, lap-dog, servants, and paintings—splendid paintings! by Charles himself, and by the masters even, brought from Italy! And then their circle, so select!—but really I must go—their friends and themselves contributing the very cream of the élite! Oh, you have no idea—but, I declare, eleven o'clock! and Fanny knows no more about getting dinner than a child. But I never know how to get away from you. And I haven't told you half. So like a palace their house is—granite front, marble steps, white as if they were never stepped on; but, then, Vinia is so nice! She is just right for Uncle Eates, I am always telling them both. And I sha'n't wonder—but I shall go now; so, this very minute, good morning—good morning. Do call; remember now. Ah, good morning—a beautiful morning! I can never find the unfastening of your gate. Oh, don't trouble yourself; here it is. Good morning, again! Now, Marie, wasn't that just like Mrs. Jones?"

MARIE. Yes; but, although I laugh, I certainly don't think it very pretty in one who says so much about benevolence, charity, politeness, and so on, as you do, to take one off in this way.

"Tis for your good, child. Don't you see? I always do these things for your good, of course, or for somebody's good."

MARIE. Heavy shocks! To say the truth, there is a certain proverb which I think you ought to wear in your bosom-pin, or else to hang before you in a frame. Guess what it is.

"This, of course, 'Let him that is without sin,' et cetera. I humble myself not a little over your suggestion. But now let this all pass. And the Bartletts were really so superb!"

MARIE. Yes; they were eminently good, accomplished, and true-hearted. They had their faults, like other people, nevertheless. Vinia, as Mrs. Jones calls her, and as we will call her, if you please—Vinia had causé, because she was idle; because, with a brain active and powerful enough to bear her out in any undertaking, she yet undertook nothing but waking, dressing, eating, trying one thing and another to be rid of the long, dull days, and then sleeping again without relish and without thankfulness. Thus, with all her wealth, talent, and strength of mind and body, she yet drivelled. No one was very much better for her being in the world; and she herself, at times that is, was consumed by a yearning to be away in Heaven, where she might move freely, and reach and clasp the beautiful and the pure, which here she perceived so dimly and afar off, and which here she could never reach. She was a poor child; and there are a great many such sufferers in this world, more than the "hewers of stone and drawers of water" and the poor wayfarers think, else they would not so often repine when they see the rich roll by them in carriages, leaving them plodding far behind. It is the truth, that Vinia's causé was a heavier burden on her than are all the toils and privations of the industrious and virtuous poor on them.

"I have no doubt of it; idleness is so horrible! I could never be idle and live. I have such energies, such—I don't know what, bounding hither and thither through my veins and nerves, if I walk, I must go bounding, if it isn't becoming in a lady of my years and of my altitude. And, when I write, I must make my pen go scratch, scratch, like this, Marie, if the editors and composers can never make it out what it all means."

MARIE. Except in the evening twilight hours, you mean, I suppose. I don't know anybody so idle and lazy as you are then.

"Ah yes, I must except evening twilight time."

MARIE. And who, pray, holds her hands and rocks so much as yourself, and is so languid in mid-summer?

"Well, it is so hot then—so hot then; but now"—

MARIE. But now—yes; and even Vinia has her snows, and so has everybody.

"I suppose it is so. And this is the way it always is, Marie; between you and Truth, I can never exalt myself, that straightway I am not justly abased. I remember Mrs. Jones told us a pretty story of Mr. Bartlett's western travels; of his painting the portrait of a very beautiful young girl, just as she sat, d l'abandon, among the prairie flowers, with her hat and work-basket on the turf at either side. She said he carried the picture everywhere; she expected he said his prayers to it. He had returned to Illinois, to 'make a wife of her,' nobody doubted. But he came back looking blue. He had had reasons of looking blue ever since; for he missed her. She had moved, with her family, to these regions somewhere; nobody could tell him where."

MARIE. That is all true. And there is a great deal more that you would be intensely interested in hearing about, and which yet I cannot to-day stop to tell you.

"Do."

MARIE. No.

"Well, tell me about the Malones, then. I just know about them up to the time of the Bartletts going to Massabesic. I know that Captain Malone paid his devoirs chiefly to Napoleon Bonaparte; that he called his beautiful little spot 'The Briers,' in memory of him; and that, to give the name an appropriateness, he brought sweetbriers, an abundance of them, to his yard and wayside. I know he named his son Napoleon, and his daughter Josephine; and that, as one grew in beauty and the other in manliness, as one elegance after another came to their home, he found greater and still greater satisfaction in calling them 'the emperor' and 'the empress.' I know, also, that still they were comparatively poor, still struggling. It would delight me not a little to learn that the rich artist had the wisdom to lay his little prairie flower away in some old Aortus siccus, and to take to himself, in hies thereof, a fresh, sweetbrier of Massabesic. Did he, Marie? Do tell me just this."

MARIE. No, I must study now. And you—you can be writing what you already know; and in this way, as you said in the beginning, illustrate some point in domestic or agricultural economy. I can't see that together we have done anything in this way. My encyclopedias—yes, here they are. Ad revoir, dearest.

CHAPTER III.

It was on the evening of the arrival of the Bartletts at Massabesic, that a pale, intelligent-looking lady of fifty sat alone in the pleasant little parlor of the Malones. Evidently she had sat down burdened with heat and lassitude. She had cast off her slippers, and her feet lay apart on the cushion before her. The strings of a light purple morning-dress, which she still kept on, were unfastened, and it hung loosely about her. One hand, with its long slender fingers, supported her head, while the other rolled the corner of a handkerchief, on which her eyes were vacantly fixed. This was the good, the patient, the industrious wife of Captain Malone, the daughter of Colonel Bamford, of Illinois.

We will just recapitulate how she met the young, adventurous, and romantic Malone, one day when he was on chasse for wild horses, and she for wild flowers; how he easily and at once gained a heart that had resisted the attacks of a British officer and a Canadian buffalo hunter, of a pedagogue from New Hampshire and a pettifogger from New York, of a real live poet from Ohio, besides some six, eight, or ten bucks of her native wilds; how she trusted and married him for his open, handsome face, his manly form, his tender and sensitive heart, for his strong arm, and for his cottage in the Granite State, amongst the lakes, and hills, and mountains. Of this latter, Malone himself thought nothing. It had been given him as a mere bauble when he was a boy, and as a bauble he had regarded it up to this day.

She married him. Years passed, and yet his wild spirit was seeking adventures in the far West. They went from State to Territory, and from Territory to State, as new and dazzling prospects of finding at last a very Eutopia were held up to him by some visionary like himself. Then he turned to his native hills; but not until he had dealt in acres by the thousand, so that his ten acres of stony soil, and his unfinished house, seemed only meet for a Lilliputian. As may be easily conceived, Mrs. Malone had found her lot no sinecure in all this failure of schemes, all this moving about. Many and severe had been her struggles with deferred hopes, poverty, toil, with sacrifices of long and dearly-cherished tasks and occupations; and, in this ordeal, her flesh had, indeed, often become weak; but her spirit had become strong and ready for conflict. And, in the last four years of severe self-denial and toil, she had set her oft-faltering husband a perfect example of trust and patient industry. A long time she gave up her books, the dearest solace in her other deprivations, snatching only a few minutes now and then for the perusal of their one weekly paper, her Bible, and an occasional new work in the cheap form, with whose purchase they indulged themselves. She gave up her flowers, her fancy-work, and her pencil, and let her guitar lie unstrung and covered with dust in an unfinished room, turning her hand to the wheel, the loom, the wash-tub, and all the lowliest occupations of her lowly sphere. Every night found her weary, yet not often unhappy; for she was satisfied with herself, and she blessed God that it was for her to make sacrifices for the good ones who were dearer far to her than her own ease and comfort; and every morning, with strengthened purpose, she commenced the labors of a new day. In all this, there was gleaming afar one bright oasis—the purchase of a fifty-acre lot, which lay along the lake and across the hills. For this they had all been working early and late, at home and abroad, dressing simply and dieting frugally. When the deed was fairly in their hands, they were all to draw long breaths; Josephine was to remain at home with them, and extended improvements were to be carried on in the house and all over the fifty-acre lot. In one grove of pliant birches, a living arbor was to be formed by bending the trees and weaving their tops and their branches together. In those old woods, a labyrinth was to be cut out, beginning and ending at the lake. In the sheltered nooks, plum-trees were to be planted; and so all around. Not a spot was to be left unimproved, and, God helping them to health, rains, and sunshine, they would make a good living and lay up something there; and, besides, make such a beautiful spot of it, that everybody should find delight in looking on.

Meanwhile, on the beautiful and light-hearted Josephine, the mantle of poetry, which the parents had dropped, seemed to have fallen. Busy as a bee from morning till night, always bounding, yet always collected and fruitful of expedients, she managed in a thousand delightful ways to assist her parents when they were weary, to cheer them when they were sad, to beautify the garden and the home. To the last, she had been able to contribute materially in the last two years, by spending nine months of each year in the mills of Lowell. She had obtained seeds, and slips, and roots in abundance. She had seen new models of elegance in yard, garden, and house decorations. Upon these she had worked. With her father's and Napoleon's aid, and slight outlays occasionally for materials, she had brought the home to be, as the Bartletts said, a little gem. Now—when this chapter opened, that is—she was in her little room adjoining the parlor, filling a small, much-worn, fur-covered trunk with her simple wardrobe. To-morrow, for the last time they all hoped, she was to go away again from them all, from the spot whose very dust she loved, to that strange city, Lowell. It was for this reason chiefly that, as she sat to rest, and as she went about preparing supper, Mrs. Malone sang, in a voice of heart-touching mournfulness—

"Oh, thou, that driest the mourner's tear,
How dark this world would be,
If, when disturbed and wounded here,
We could not turn to thee!"

"Here are your clothes, Josey, dear. I believe they are perfectly aired—

"If, when disturbed and wounded here,
We could not turn to thee!"

said and sang the mother, as she carried some clothes from the frame to her daughter. "Poor child, you are tired! Sit down here now, and let me pack the rest. No; I can't be put off with a shake of your head. Your cheeks look as if the blood were coming through them. I shall have time enough to rest after you are gone; while you"—

Her voice failed. She left the room, saying something about supper and seven o'clock; and then, in a few moments, with a voice faltering as Josephine had not heard it for years, she sang—

"How dark this world would be!"

She turned again, restlessly, to Josephine's room.

"I don't know why it is, Josephine, but I have never felt half so bad about your going away as I do now; not even when you went the first time. There, let me finish. It will be necessary to crowd the things to get all in."

"And so, mother, this is the very reason I shall not let you do it. You—I never saw you look so very, very tired as you do to-night. I am sorry; I ought to have taken one more day. But I am in a hurry to begin, that, as soon as possible, I may be through. And then I can come home to stay, mother!" She said no more; but the mother and the daughter wept together.

"Do you know, Josephine," said the mother, "I am sure I don't think I am at all superstitious, but a dread of something has settled here like lead, and I have no power to remove it. You are smiling at me; but you must not think your mother a poor, weak woman; indeed, you must not."

"No, indeed, mother; but"—

"And yet I am weak. The truth is, I am tired of this struggle. I dread what is before me, in having you go away for so long. Your father and Napoleon will be gone so much; and then the cold winter days and stormy nights! If you were here, I should never mind them. But, as it is, I lie awake and think of you, fearing that you haven't bed-clothes to keep you warm in the great boarding-house; that you are sick, perhaps dying at that moment; and sometimes I am so foolish, so excited, as to get the horrible fancy that you may be perishing in the snow on your way to us; and I can scarcely keep myself from going and looking out for you in the darkness and storm. I dread this. And taking all the care on myself again; and there are many other things; and, if it were not for your poor father, Napoleon, and you, I would be glad to lay my head down on that pillow and go at once to the eternal rest. But, Josephine, my poor, dear child, you are crying. Come here."

Josephine sat down at her mother's feet, laid her face on her lap, and, for a few moments, wept like a little child.

"I was very selfish to complain," said Mrs. Malone, in more cheerful tones. "I suppose you already had as much trouble of your own account as you could well bear. There, that is right. We will sit here now and rest until they come to supper. I don't know where your father is." And again her face was clouded. "Have you noticed of late, and especially to-day, that your father isn't at all like himself, so quiet and serious? I don't know; he don't seem unhappy really; but he don't talk, says nothing of his business plans, and this is so unlike him these last four years. I sometimes fear that his old habits, old troubles, and perplexities are all coming back. But it can't be; he is so industrious! so systematic in everything! Yet he looks at us all in such a sad, still way, as I never saw him do before; and, this morning, I saw his eyes fill several times."

"So did I, ma; but he looked so happy and good! I have no fears for pa—not one fear for him."

"Only he may be sick," persisted Mrs. Malone, who was as unlike Mrs. Malone as she could well be. "He was pale, certainly, this morning, and so changed! He seemed so very, very kind, so tender of us all!"

"Well, we shall soon see that it is all right, my mother. The clock strikes; they will soon be here. There, Rido's bark! the emperor's laugh! and pa's, too, ma!—and pa's, too! There they are, father and Napoleon, stopping to talk with grandpa; and they point to the fifty-acre lot. And, in one year, it will be ours, ma; and then good-by to the mills! And then sha'n't we be the happiest family in the State? Say, pa," she added, springing to the door to meet them, "sha'n't we be the happiest of all, when once this year is over, and?"—

Her father caught her nervously to his bosom, and kissed her forehead. She perceived, as he did this, that he trembled, and that tears were in his eyes. Mrs. Malone also saw it, and perfectly understood the look of apprehension Josephine turned to her. She felt paralyzed, sick, and faint at heart. Pecuniary embarrassments had been the prolific source whence all the troubles of her life had come. The poet's complaint—

"I never loved a flower
Which was not the first to fade"— variously modified, had been hers. Excepting her husband and children, she had scarcely ever set her heart upon anything.

"But, when it came to know her well,
And love her, it was sure to die."

And now, in those moments of fearful suspense, visions of accumulated bills, sheriffs, and sales of execution, of a dreary and poverty-laden old age, passed before her bewildered thought, and she could have shrieked with such horrible apprehensions. She passed her hands slowly across her forehead.

"Peace be unto this house, I may well say now, and thanksgiving to our God!" said the old gentleman, whose slow steps had just gained the room. Tears were streaming down furrows which seemed made purposely for their channels. He laid his hand on his granddaughter's head as he spoke. The emperor stood there—has my reader ever seen a bright-eyed boy at lyceum or theatre, who felt from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet that that was coming off on the boards which ought certainly to be cheered and encoored, and who yet waited the example of his elders, with humus busing upon his tongue, with his feet on tipped toes, and with open palms grasping nervously his knees? Thus stood the emperor there. His mother and Josephine saw it; still it did not much reassure them; for, like the other Emperor Napoleon, his sagacity often failed him in minor matters. Mr. Malone's was an expression that would have puzzled Lavater even. He laid aside his hat, and glanced at his wife; put the hair back from his broad forehead, and glanced at his daughter; and, as he looked on the table, and said something about supper being ready, he drew out his pocket-book and began to search for a—a bill of execution, thought Mrs. Malone; and, O Heaven, have mercy! with every breath, thought Josephine, who shivered now from head to foot with apprehension.

Meanwhile, very slowly, Mr. Malone opened a slip of paper, and read, in deliberate tones, a deed of the fifty-acre lot, for value received, duly signed and attested. Mrs. Malone gave not a look, she spake not a word; but, covering her face deep in her handkerchief, she wept in a thousand conflicting emotions: in penitence that, at last, when she had been so long and so faithfully sustained of her God, when the cup of joy which had so long been held out before her as the prize of her patience, her self-denial, and her faith, was near her, even at her lips, that then she had lost her trust; and in thanksgiving she wept, for the ten thousand mercies she then saw in husband, children, parent, and home, seemed floating like white-winged angels in the whole place, making it "none other than the house of God, and the very gate of Heaven." Josephine, too, wept, and she laughed in the same moment.

"Now, mother, now sis, if this isn't pretty well!" This was all the emperor said. And he attempted to laugh; wiped a tear with his finger-point, and this was all; when all along he had been determined on shouting, in all his might, hurrah! Io triumphe! hurrah for the fifty-acre lot! upon throwing his hat in the air, clapping his hands until they were blistered, and upon making bonfires on all the elevated positions of the lot. But, instead, he went softly away to his chamber, looked out on the fifty-acre lot, where lay now the golden light of sunseting, burnishing lake, rock, and tree; and then wept one minute in downright joy that, at last, they had got it; that then it was fairly theirs; that they were all so happy then; and, most of all, that now his darling Josephine might stay at home, sing to him, walk with him, breathe with him at any hour the pure air of heaven, and listen with him to the birds, the brooks, and the winds among the waves and the trees.

Josephine likewise rejoiced in this. But with her there were counteracting emotions, remembrances of pleasant and beloved faces at Lowell, which now she would see no more. There were many loving hearts there amongst her fellow-operatives, that longed now for her coming; that would mourn her loss as sister mourns for sister. For one there, who had mourned herself sick for the late loss of parents and home, her heart ached as the mother's does, when, in pursuit of ease or pleasure, she takes herself for a while from her vigils at the sick bed of the beloved and loving child, whose eye kindles only at her approach, whose head finds a perfect repose only when her hand smooths the pillow, and whose spirit seems tearing its fragile body in its yearning to cling to her only, her always. And yet perhaps her friend might recover sufficiently to come to Massabesic. Happy thought! Then she would take her out to pleasant rides and pleasant walks. She would feed her with warm new milk and ripe berries. She would lead her slowly about among the romantic beauties of the fifty-acre lot; and together, as her friend became stronger, as her heart grew light, they would help work out those improvements that had been planned in the last four years. She would introduce her to the Lanes, those good people; and Mr. Lane would strengthen her with his strength, Mrs. Lane cheer her with her happiness, her loving kindness.

Josephine set the chairs about the table. Napoleon showed his face in their midst. Mrs. Malone wiped her tears; but still her chin quivered, still her eyes filled ever and anon.

"But why did you keep it all from us so long, Mr. Malone?" asked she, as they seated themselves at table.

"Why, we have been so often cheated, you know, when we thought ourselves secure, I could not run the risk of again disappointing you."

"Yes, we have been often cheated; but you have said that it was because you were led by your tastes rather than your judgment, and so planned groves, labyrinths, and parterres, when you should have been working on corn-fields and turnip-yards. Now, when we have all been so prudent, when you had succeeded so well in your vegetables, how could you fear?"

"I feared nothing but sickness. This, doctor's and nurse's bills, loss of time, and other costs, would, in a little time, have put off the purchase another year."

"Yes, true. Thank Heaven, we were preserved so well!"

"Yes, yes, thank Heaven, to be sure!" said their neighbor Brown, a bustling little body, who entered just then.

He was the independent owner of an independent fortune; id est, he had a farm and a mill, a house in town, and money in the bank, and stock in bridges and railroads; only a few hundreds, to be sure, in each deposit, he was so wretchedly fearful of incendiaries, bankruptcies, floods, and earthquakes. There, at the lake, he had a great farm tolerably well tilled, a great wife tolerably well willed, a great barn very well filled, and a great house. Of tall sons and small daughters he had an abundance; and, withal, he had an abundance of pride on their behalf. He had many other things. Of the book family, he had ensconced on a little dingy shelf in one corner of his kitchen, first, a Bible. This he read much, ay, studied; and it was chiefly to ascertain, with positive correctness, whether John wrote the Book of Revelations before or after the destruction of Jerusalem; what was meant where Christ says, "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?" and about the seven vials and seals, and beasts and candlesticks. Secondly—I present them in the order in which they were arranged on Mr. Brown's shelf—secondly, a copy of the "New Hampshire Gazetteer," and there was no end to the lore Mr. Brown and his whole family had gathered from that. Thirdly, "Thinks I to Myself," and truly a nondescript affair was this, without beginning and without end; its original cover gone—and this was too bad, the Browns all said, it was such a beautiful red—and in its stead was a soiled cover of brown paper, securely fastened through the back with black thread, accurately chain-stitched and cross-stitched. Its title was elaborately written out on that same cover, beset on all sides with the most extensive flourishes, on the angular principle chiefly. Said cover was the product of the combined skill of John and Patty, when the one was eighteen and the other twenty, and the cause of oft-expressed regret on the part of Mr. Brown that he "hadn't give 'em a better edication." "Thinks I to Myself" was Mr. Brown's favorite, of all others, as marginal notes, hieroglyphics, which no one but himself could comprehend, leaves turned down, marks inserted, together with incidents and passages which he was forever relating and quoting, demonstrated. Fourthly, a stray copy of "Godey's Lady's Book;" and it would take an hour to give Mr. Brown's version of its history; how he obtained it one time when he went to Concord, before Manchester was a city, with a load of pork and poultry; how he read the story called "Mrs. Washington Potts" to Miss Lane and Miss Malone, and showed the pictures to some hunters that stopped there to get some bread and cheese; what Miss Lane and Miss Malone said of the story, and what the hunters of the pictures. There were old almanacs, whose enigmas, laws, problems, and prognostications were perfect wonders to Mr. Brown. He always shook his head over them, and said, "Wall, I don't know; some folks have pretty considerable of one thing and another in their heads, that's a fact." Of pictures, he had nailed up in his parlor several six by nine wood engravings—"Man Friday," "Little Pompey," &c. &c. These he had regarded as perfect prodigies up to the time of the removal of the Lanes and Malones. Then "the greater glory dimmed the less."

"Yes, thank Heaven, of course," repeated he, as he advanced to his seat, his little head nodding and waving about like a plume, and his eyes blinking in a way that he meant should be highly intelligible. He shook them all heartily by the hand. "Yes, I'm glad for ye," said he. "We've allers been good friends, and I expect we allers shall be, if you get to be the master o' a dozen fifty-acre lots."

En passant, be it known, that Mr. Brown acknowledged no standard of worth but wealth; and, as he was one of the richest men in Manchester, he thought himself one of the most honorable of her sons, albeit others were more intelligent, more generous, and more just. Hence it was strange to him that he had not yet been in the legislature; passing strange that Mr. Lane, only half so rich, was preferred before him!

"And our young folks 've allers been pretty thick, if I've seen right, 'specially our John and your Jos'phine here. You han't forgot the ride you had in my new sleigh, I s'pose, last winter, have you, Jos'phine? He! he! ha! I remember, you called it dedicatin' the sleigh. I've luffed more 'an a little at that idea o' yourn. Wall, wall, never mind. You may ride in it as much as you 've a mind to. Captain, now if you was like Mr. and Miss Twist in my book of 'Thinks I to Myself,' and if I was like 'Thinks I to Myself's' father, we might jine our lots—Josephine can guess how—and then we'd make all Manchester stand one side. Ha! ha! and, captain, you could do as somebody did I read about in a paper I see once, called 'The Boston Post.' Somebody—a man that hadn't nothin', nor that neither, hardly—was telling one day, says he, 'Deacon—Deacon somebody, I've forgot who—'Deacon Somebody and I keeps twenty cows.' 'How many does the deacon keep?' says t'other. 'Nineteen.' Pooh! boo! boo! ha! Ain't that a good hint, captain?"

"But a hint upon which I should be the last one to act, you know," answered Mr. Malone. "Take some supper with us, Mr. Brown?"

"No, I guess I won't; I shall find supper enough to home."

"I presume so. You know, I sha'n't hold my head an inch higher for this acquisition. On the contrary, a greater humility and thankfulness than I ever felt before I feel now. I feel like bowing in the dust in thankfulness to God, who has blessed me so much when I had been such a poor steward so long. Isn't it so with you, Eliza?"

His eyes were swimming in tears as he turned them to his wife. She could only bow in reply, and then she raised her tumbler to her lips to conceal her emotion.

"You all take it oddly enough, that's a fact," said Mr. Brown, moving nervously in his chair. "I suppose you'll give your folks tea and coffee to drink arter this, Miss Malone?"

"No; we all love cold water. It is the cheapest and the healthiest drink."

"Strange! Wall, you'll have sumthin' else for your suppers, sha'n't you, besides bread, and butter, and plums?"

"Not often. We are all perfectly satisfied with it; and it is economical and"—

"Ah, I don't know about that," and the little man's head nodded and waved, while his eyes and mouth performed sundry knowing contortions. "I don't know about that. We've had pretty considerable to do in the eatin' line, and I've thought a great deal about the cheapest way of doing things; and I think"—Mr. Brown always emphasized I—"and I think the cheapest way is to get good vittles, and enough on 'em, and a good many kinds. It's the best way. Now, for our suppers, we shall have cold meat and taters, cake, and butter, and sarse, sweet cake and pie; besides tea, and sugar, and cream, and pickles, and cheese; yes, and pepper, and salt, and vinegar. You laff; but we shall have all on 'em, I'll warrant ye; and, arter all, we sha'n't eat no more vally in all these things than you amongst you will in bread, and butter, and sarse."

"Allowing this," answered Mr. Malone, smiling good-humoredly, "it takes no more than fifteen minutes to get our suppers: and your wife"—

"Why I suppose it takes her on an average at least an hour; and she has almost all the galls on the spring helpin' her."

"Well, you see we have one decided advantage, in economy of time, and time is our best estate."

"I s'pose ye have. But then how spindlin' ye all are! As one of them 'ere hunters said, your wife is like a pondy lily and Josephine is like a rosy; and you'd find 'twould take no more to blast 'em than 'twould such things. Now our boys, Joseph and John, could take 'em both and carry 'em to the top of that mountain away off there; but you nor 'Poleon couldn't carry one-half of our Patty up that hill."

How the emperor laughed then! "Do you remember, Mr. Brown, how I outran, outclimbed, outlified, and outleaped your boys last Fourth of July? how I reached that hill-top while they were panting and holding themselves together half-way down its side? Do you remember?"

"Wall, wall! as I said before, you are so spindlin'!"

"Yes; well, since 'tis to bread and water we owe it that we are thus spindling, I must still throw up my hat for bread and water." He left the table as he spoke; bowed gracefully to Mr. Brown as he took his hat; kissed Josephine in passing, and sang to her, "Come, come, come! come to the sunset tree." In a moment his hoe was heard in its progress amongst the gravel and weeds of the garden, and Josephine was at his side helping him.

Mr. Brown sat a while as if in uneasy cogitation, with his eyes fixed on the open door where Josephine had vanished.

"I'd give a dollar to know how it is, faith! Somehow your boy and gall have got lightness of spirits as well as lightness of body. I never yet see the day when my boys could make a bow like that 'Poleon made; nor that my galls could sail out o' the room as Josephine did then."

"To tell you the truth, neighbor Brown, I think light and simple diet the best promoter of light and cheerful spirits, an easy conscience of course excepted."

"Wall, I don't know but 'tis, faith! come to think of it, for I never feel so much like begrudging the hogs their comfort laying in the straw, as I do just arter I've been eatin' hearty. 'Tis so confounded hard to work then!" He ended with a—

"But, Marie!—Marie! Come here now and see me make a drawing of Mr. Brown, that queer man at Massabesic. The outline of his visage, see! 'tis round, just like a pumpkin. His eyes, they might have been somewhat elongated primitively; but now they are as round as a half-dime. I will fix some dark rags at their corners; for, round as they are, they yet have the look of being asquint. This comes probably from his being at all times so conscious of his shrewdness. His nose, you see, is a decided pug. His mouth is the trouble. I have already drawn three outlines; one, three one-half inches in width; another circular, two inches in circumference; the other a medium. The last is probably his mouth's standard. His chin is a snub of all sorts of indentations and convulsions."

MARIE. How you talk, dearest!

"How I have occasion to, dearest! There! I shall certainly be obliged to let his chin go at that. 'Twould be as easy to represent accurately his head's gyrations as his chin. His attitude—ah, 'more's the pity!' 'Tis Dickens's and Marryat's and Hall's vast picture of Yankeeism in caricature. His chair must be tipped back and lodged against the wall, thus: his legs thrown over each side of the chair-bottom, thus: and while the one is left dangling, the other must be twisted round clinging to a chair-round, thus. But, Penseé, don't laugh quite so loud; the doctor will be showing his face at the door. See! isn't that capitally done? his head and body bent forward in this manner, one hand with arm acutely-angularly-akimbo"—

MARIE. Mercy, dearest!

"Ha! and see; its fellow-hand is left free to make gestures, or drum with the knife it holds on the chair-bottom between his legs, or to whittle bits which he picks occasionally from the contents of the wood-box at his side. Oh! he ought to have been drawn spitting. He is always spitting, you know, real yellow tobacco juice. The monster!"

MARIE. You make me shudder, dearest. Pray, do you honestly think we have any reason to be vexed with Dickens, or Trollop, or anybody who—

"No indeed! no indeed! not even with that writer of the 'Edinburgh Review' who said that Americans spit as soon as they are born, spit through life, and at last spit out their expiring breath."

MARIE. But then, poor Mr. Brown!

"Yes; poor Mr. Brown. We will not scorn him at all instinctively as we are inclined to do this. Like many in this our day and generation, he inherited a bad organization from parents, grandparents, and great-grandparents, who lived mostly in the sensual; together with bad habits from a father, whose only care it was to add yet other acres to his farm, yet other hundreds to his glittering horde, and yet other horses, cows, chickens, turkeys, and geese to his homestead menagerie. True, the son must learn to read, write, and cipher, at least as far as through interest. This was indispensable in the art of acquiring and retaining property. The daughters likewise must learn somewhat of the same; for they might be widows and have estates to settle. But into all the mysteries of all sorts of cookery, and other work, they must be thoroughly initiated. Habits of acquisition and saving must be ingrafted into their very being. Pity that these habits did not extend themselves into that branch of household economy where their fruits would have been really saving—the dietetic! But no; here also the animal reigned. To eat abundantly, superabundantly, and of food of superabundant lusciousness, was a prime article of the elder Brown's creed. And when his conscience whispered him, as it sometimes did, about his deeds of extortion, fraudulent bargaining, and so forth, he silenced its reproofs by referring to his generously furnished board, his overflowing larder, the plenty he spread before all who claimed his hospitalities. Something more conscience said about his being just before he could be generous, but in fainter and fainter tones. So that he went on in his self-justifications, ay, in his self-glorifications; and hugged the closer his delusions as death began beckoning him away. He died a wretched, wretched death. Then the papers wrote him 'a faithful husband, an indulgent parent, a benevolent neighbor, and a good citizen.' His funeral text was, 'Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his,' his epitaph, 'Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord.' Ah, Marie, how full is this world of temptations to get wealth—to get it by some means—at any rate, to be rich!"

MARIE. Alas, yes! And still, dearest, not so great and many are they, if one looks a little below the surface. Mr. Brown would have been a miserable man in all his hardness of soul, if this adulation and all the deference he met had been sincere. But they were only lip and hand service; matter-of-course homage to his wealth and assumed consequence. Everybody read his other and true inscriptions written in blood and tears on the hearts and on the brows of all those he had wronged and cheated. Everybody could see the scars of wounds he had been all his lifetime making, in treading upon all the low and feeble on his march to wealth. Ah! let him rest in peace, dearest. Never envy him, nor any like him the miserable pittance they get for all their anxiety and toil. And the son of such a man, the present Mr. Brown, pity him! Rub out that drawing.

"Pity him I will, I do from my very heart; but rub out his picture I will not. I will show it to him, and to others like him; for, if they are to be pitied, if they are not very, very much to be blamed, all things considered, 'they yet need to see themselves as others see them;' they yet need to mend for their own sakes, for their neighbors', and for the sake of the capacities that God has given them for usefulness, improvement, and happiness, and which they do so neglect or misapply."

SONG.—TO THEE, MY LOVE.

BY SAMUEL M'NUTT.

AWAY from thee, my gentle one,
From Fanny distant far,
I rove alone; but thou art still
My loved, my guiding star.

When morning's gay and silver light
Is shed o'er wold and lea,
My early thought is borne away
To thee, my love, to thee.

At noonday, in the forest glades,
I range the wildwood free;
But still my fancy wings away
To thee, my love, to thee.

And when the last fair tints of eve
Forsake the world and me,
Fond mem'ry brings me back again
To thee, my love, to thee.

The land of Dreams, with gems and flowers
Of other years, I see:
I'm there, amid its golden gleams,
With thee, my love, with thee.

At morning, noon, and dewy eve—
On shore or silv'ry sea—
My heart still turns, as to a star
To thee, my love, to thee.

HISTORY OF BOOTS AND SHOES.

NO. IV.—ON THE MORE MODERN FORMS OF FOREIGN BOOTS AND SHOES.

UPON critically examining the various forms assumed by the coverings for the feet adopted by the nations around us, we shall find that they were in no small degree modified by the circumstances with which they were surrounded, or the necessities of the climate they inhabited.

Thus, the northern nations of Europe enswathed their legs in skins, and used the same material for the shoes, binding the whole in warm folds about the leg, the thongs being fastened to them in the manner represented in Fig. 1, and which is copied from a full-length figure of a Russian boor, in 1768. The sandal of a Russian lady of the same period is given in Fig. 2, and the men of Friesland, at the same time, wore sandals or shoes of a similar construction, the common people generally wearing a close leathern shoe and clog, something like those in use in the Middle Ages; one delineated in Fig. 3, of our plate, and is represented on the feet of a countrywoman in the curious series of costumes of Finland, engraved in Jeffery's collection of the dresses of different nations, published in 1757, and which were copied from some very rare prints, at least a century earlier in point of date. Another female's shoe is given in Fig. 4; it is a low slipper-like shoe, and is secured by a band across the instep, having an ornamental clasp, like a brooch, to secure it on each side of the foot, it was probably a coarsely made piece of jewelry, with glass or cheap stones set around it; as the people of this country at that time were fond of such showy decorations, and particularly upon their shoes. The noblemen and ladies always decorated theirs with ornaments and jewels all over the upper surface, of which we give two specimens in Figs. 5 and 6; the former upon the foot of a nobleman, the latter upon that of a matron of the upper classes. It will be seen that both are very elegant, and must have been very showy wear.

The boots of a Hungarian gentleman, in 1700, may be seen in Fig. 7, and such boots were common to Bohemia at the same period. They are chiefly remarkable for the way in which they are cut upward from the middle of the thigh to the knee, and then curl over in front of the leg.

A Tartarian lady, of 1577, is exhibited by John Wiesel, the engraver of Nuremberg, in his work on dress, in the boots delineated in Fig. 8. They are remarkable for the sole to which they are affixed, and which was, no doubt, formed of some strong substance, probably with metallic hooks to assist the wearer in walking a mountainous country where frosts abound.

Descending towards the south, we shall find a lighter sort of shoe in use, and one partaking more of the character of a slipper, used more as a protection for the sole of the foot in walking than as an article of warmth. Thus the shoes generally used in the East scarcely do more than cover the toes; yet, from constant use, the natives hardly ever allow them to slip from the feet. The learned author of the notes to "Knight's Pictorial Bible," speaking from personal observation of these articles, says: "The common shoe in Turkey or Arabia is like our slipper with quarters, except that it has a sharp and prolonged toe turned up. No shoes in Western Asia have ears, and they are generally of colored leather—red or yellow morocco in Turkey and Arabia, and green shagreen in Persia. In the latter country, the shoe or slipper in general use (having no quarters) has a very high heel; but, with this exception, the heels in these countries are generally flat. No shoes, or even boots, have more than a single sole (like what we call 'pumps'), which, in wet weather, imbibes the water freely. When the shoe without quarters is used, an inner slipper, with quarters, but without a sole, is worn inside, and the outer one alone is thrown off on entering a house. But in Persia, instead of this inner shoe of leather, they use a worsted sock. Those shoes that have quarters are usually worn without any inner covering for the foot. The peasantry and the nomade tribes usually go barefoot, or wear a rude sandal or shoe of their own manufacture; those who possess a pair of red leather or other shoes seldom wear them except on holiday occasions, so that they last a long time, if not so long as among the Maltese, with whom a pair of shoes endures for several generations, being, even on holiday occasions, more frequently carried in the hand than worn on the feet. The boots are generally of the same construction and material as the shoes; and the general form may be compared to that of the buskin, the height varying from the mid-leg to near the knee. They are of capacious breadth, except among the Persians, whose boots generally fit close to the leg, and are mostly of a sort of Russia leather, uncolored; whereas those of other people are, like the slipper, of red and yellow morocco. There is also a boot or shoe for walking in frosty weather, which differs from the common one only in having under the heel iron tips, which, being partly bent vertically with a jagged edge, give a hold on the ice, which prevents slipping, and are particularly useful in ascending or descending the frozen mountain paths—reminding us of the sort of boot worn by Tartarian ladies, as given in Fig. 8. The shoes of the Oriental ladies are sometimes highly ornamented; the covering part being wrought with gold, silver, and silk, and perhaps set with jewels, real or imitated. Examples of such decorated shoes are given in Figs. 9 and 10, and will sufficiently explain themselves to the eye of the reader, rendering detailed description unnecessary. The shoes of noblemen are of precisely similar construction.

In China, the boots and shoes of the men are worn as clumsy and inelegant as in any country. They are broad at the toe, and sometimes upturned. We give a specimen of both in the subjoined woodcut. They are no doubt easy to wear.

Not so are the ladies' shoes, for they only are allowed the privilege of discomfort, fashion having in this country declared in favor of small feet, and the prejudices of the people having gone with it, the feet of all ladies of decent rank in society are cramped in early life, by being placed in so straight a confinement that their growth thus retarded, and they are not more than three or four inches in length from the toe to the heel. By the smallness of the foot, the rank or high breeding of the lady is decided on, and the utmost torment is endured by the girls in early life to insure themselves this distinction in rank; the lower classes of females not being allowed to torture themselves in the same manner. The Chinese poets frequently indulge in panegyrics on the beauty of these crippled members of the body, and none of their heroines are considered perfect without excessively small feet, when they are affectionately termed by them "the little golden lilies." It is needless to say that the tortures of early youth are succeeded by a crippled maturity, a Chinese lady of high birth being scarcely able to walk without assistance. A specimen of such a foot and shoe is given in Fig. 11. These shoes are generally made of silk, and embroidered in the most beautiful manner with flowers and ornaments, in colored silk and threads of gold and silver. A piece of stout silk is generally attached to the heel for the convenience of pulling up the shoe.

Having bestowed some attention on ancient Egypt, we may briefly allude to the shoes of modern times, as given in Lane's work devoted to the history of the manners and customs of the modern Egyptians. They, like the Persian ones, have an upturned toe, and may with equal ease be drawn on and thrown off. Yet a shoe is also worn with a high instep and high in the heel, which will be best understood by the first figure in the accompanying cut.

The Turkish ladies of the sixteenth century, and very probably much earlier, wore a very high shoe known in Europe by the name of a "chopine." In the voyages and travels of N. de Nicholay Dauphinois, Seigneur D'Arffreville, Valet de Chambre and Geographer to the King of France, printed at Lyons, 1568, one of the ladies of the Grand Seigneur's seraglio is represented in a pair of chopines, of which we copy one in Fig. 12. This fashion spread in Europe in the early part of the seventeenth century, and it is alluded to by Hamlet, in Act II, Scene 2, when he exclaims, "Your ladyship is nearer heaven than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chopine;" by which it would appear that something of the kind was known in England, where it may have been introduced from Venice, as the ladies there wore them of the most exaggerated size. Coryat, in his "Crudities," 1611, says: "There is one thing used of the Venetian women, and some others dwelling in the cities and towns subject to signiory of Venice, that is not to be observed—I think—amongst any other women in Christendom"—the reader must remember that it was new to Coryat, but a common fashion in the East—"which is so common in Venice that no woman whatsoever goeth without it, either in her house or abroad—a thing made of wood, and covered with leather of sundry colors; some with white, some red, some yellow. It is called a chapiney, which they never wear under their shoes. Many of these are curiously painted; some of them I have also seen fairly gilt; so uncomely a thing, in my opinion, that it is a pity this foolish custom is not clean banished and exterminated out of the city. There are many of these chapineys of a great height, even half a yard high, which maketh many of their women that are very short seem much taller than the tallest women we have in England. Also, I have heard it observed among them, that by how much the nobler a woman is, by so much the higher are her chapineys. All their gentlewomen, and most of their wives and widows that are of any wealth, are assisted and supported either by men or women, when they walk abroad, to the end they might not fall. They are borne up most commonly by the left arm, otherwise they might quickly take a fall." In "Douce's Illustrations of Shakspeare," a woodcut of such a chapiney, or chopine, is given, which is here copied, and it is an excellent example of the thing, showing the decoration which was at times bestowed on it.

Douce quotes some curious particulars of this fashion, in "Raymond's Voyage through Italy," 1648, and the following curious account of the chopine occurs: "This place (Venice) is much frequented by the walking May-poles; I mean the women; they wear their coats half too long for their bodies; being mounted on their chippeens (which are as high as a man's leg), they walke between two handmaids, majestically deliberating of every step they take." Howel also says of the Venetian women: "They are low and of small stature, for the most part, which makes them to raise their bodies upon high shoes, called chapins, which gave me occasion to say that the Venetian ladies were made of three things: one part of them was wood, meaning their chapins; another part was their apparel; and the third part was a woman. The senate hath often endeavored to take away the wearing of those high shoes, but all women are so passionately delighted with this kind of state that no law can wean them from it." Douce adds that "some have supposed that the jealousy of Italian husbands gave rise to the invention of the chopine," and quotes a story from a French author to show their dislike to an alteration; he also says, that "the first ladies who rejected the use of the chopine were the daughters of the Doge Dominico Contareno, about the year 1670." The chopine, or some kind of high shoe, was occasionally used in England. Bulwer, in his "Artificial Changeling," p. 550, complains of this fashion as a monstrous affectation, and says that his countrywomen therein imitated the Venetian and Persian ladies. In "Sandy's Travels," 1615, there is a figure of a Turkish lady with chopines, and it is not improbable that the Venetians might have borrowed them from the Greek islands in the Archipelago. We know that something similar was in use amongst the ancient Greeks. Xenophon, in "Economics," mentions the wife of Ischomachus as wearing high shoes, for increasing her stature. They are still worn by the women in many parts of Turkey, but more particularly at Aleppo. Douce's notice of their antiquity is curiously corroborated by the discovery in the tombs of Ancient Egypt of such shoes; they are formed of a stout sole of wood, to which are affixed four round props, raising the wearer a foot in height; specimens were among the collections of Mr. Salt, the British Consul in Egypt, from which some of the choicest Egyptian antiquities in the English national collection were obtained. The other remark of Douce's, that they were probably derived from the Greek islands of the Archipelago, is confirmed by the fact that high-soled boots and shoes were much coveted by the ladies there, to raise their stature, and were worn when chopines had long been disused; thus the high-soled boots delineated in Fig. 13 are found upon the feet of "a young lady of Argentiera," one of these islands, in a print dated 1700; and, in another of the same date, giving the costume of a lady of the neighboring Island of Naxis, the shoe shown in Fig. 14 is worn.

Of the modern European nations with whom we have been most in contact—England, Spain, France, and the Netherlands—their boots and shoes have so nearly resembled our own as to render a detailed description scarcely necessary. Indeed, as France has been tacitly submitted to as the arbitrer elegantiarum in all matters of dress, much has been derived from thence.

There was, however, a French shoe that we do not ever appear to have adopted: it was made low in the quarters, and ended at the instep; there was no covering for the heel or the sides of the foot beyond it. The fashion spread to Venice; and the figure of a Venetian lady, of 1750, has supplied us with the specimen in Fig. 15.

The sabots of France is another peculiarity which was never adopted elsewhere. They are generally clumsy enough; their large size and bad fit are generally improved by the introduction of others made of list, which give warmth and steadiness to the foot. A small wooden shoe is, however, made in Normandy and elsewhere, much like that which came into fashion about 1790, with an imitation of its fringes and pointed toe, and which is generally painted black; the ordinary sabot being totally unadorned, and the color of the wood. In the cut here given, both are introduced. The first figure is the ordinary shoe, and the second, the extraordinary or genteel one.

And now having, in the pursuit of our history of boots and shoes,

"Travelled the wide world all over,"

let us not dismiss the subject without a parting look at the "Brogues" of Ireland, which, upon the authority of Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall, especially deserve our attention. In their work on Ireland, they engrave the figure of this article, which we copy, Fig. 16, and say: "The brogue, or shoe, of the Irish peasantry, differs in its construction from the shoe of any other country. It was formerly made of untanned hide; but, for the last century at least, it has been made of tanned leather. The leather of the uppers is much stronger than what is used in the strongest shoes; being made of cow-hide dressed for the purpose, and it never had an inside lining, like the ordinary shoe; the sole leather is generally of an inferior description. The process of making the brogue is certainly different from that of shoe-making; and the tools used in the work, except the hammer, pinchers, and knife, bear little analogy. The awl, though used in common by those operators, is much larger than the largest used by the shoemaker, and unlike in the bend and form. The regular brogue was of two sorts, the single and double pump. The former consisted of the sole and uppers only; the latter had a welt sewed between the sole and upper leather, which gave it a stouter appearance and stronger consistency; in modern times, the brogue-maker has assimilated his manufacture to the shoe by sewing the welt on an inner sole, and then attaching the outer sole to it, in shoe fashion. In the process of making the regular brogue, there formerly were neither hemp, wax, nor bristles used by the workmen, the sewing all being performed with a thong, made of horsehide, prepared for the purpose." Thus the construction of this article is quite different from that of the English shoe; and it is made and stitched without a last, the upper leather and side being secured by sewing together; it is then turned inside out, and, for the first time, put upon the last, and being well fitted to it by a smooth iron surface, it is placed before the fire to dry and harden. "The heel of the brogue is made of what they call 'jumps,' tanner's shavings stuck together with a kind of paste, and pressed hard and dried, either before the fire or in the sun. This, when properly dried, is cut to the size of the heel and sewed down with the thong, and then covered with a top piece of very thin sole leather, fastened on with deal or sally pegs; and in this one particular they had to boast over the shoemakers in the neatness of execution. When the brogue is ready to be taken off the last, they give it the last finish by rubbing it over with a woollen rag saturated in tallow, and then the brogue is considered fit for sale. The brogue is worn larger than the foot, and the space is filled up with a sap of hay or straw. They are considered by the country people more durable for field labor, being less liable to rip in the sewing than if put together with hemp and wax; and, being cheaper than shoes, are in more general use, although there are few people, particularly females, who can afford it, who do not keep shoes for Sunday or holiday wear. The brogue-makers pride themselves in the antiquity of their trade, and boast over the shoemakers, whom they consider only a spurious graft on their most noble art."

Sir Walter Scott, in his "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border," has noticed a peculiarity in the make of the "original" shoes of that country, in the notes to the ballad of the "Souters," or shoemakers of Selkirk, who achieved immortality in song by their bravery in aiding their sovereign, James IV., in the fatal field of Flodden. He says, "the single-soled shoon," made by the souters of Selkirk, were a sort of brogues, with a single thin sole; the purchaser himself performing the further operation of sewing on another of thick leather. The rude and imperfect state of this manufacture sufficiently evinces the antiquity of the craft. He notices "a singular custom observed at conferring the freedom of the burgh. Four or five bristles, such as are used by shoemakers, are attached to the seal of the Burgess ticket. The new-made burgess must dip in his wine, and pass through his mouth, in token of respect for the souters of Selkirk. This ceremony is on no account dispensed with." And when Sir Walter afterwards adds, in a note, that he has "himself the honor to be a souter of Selkirk," we may feel the additional zest that would give to the chorus of their old trade song:—

"Up wi' the Souters of Selkirk,
And down wi' the Earl of Home;
And up wi' a' the braw lads
That sew the single-soled shoon!"

THE MYSTERIES OF A FLOWER.

BY PROFESSOR E. HUNT.

FLOWERS have been called the stars of the earth; and certainly, when we examine those beautiful creations, and discover them, analyzing the sunbeam and sending back to the eye the full luxury of colored light, we must confess there is more real appropriateness in the term than even the poet who conceived the delicate thought imagined. Lavoisier beautifully said: "The fable of Prometheus is but the outshading of a philosophic truth—where there is light, there is organization and life; where light cannot penetrate, Death forever holds his silent court." The flowers, and, indeed, those far inferior forms of organic vegetable life which never flower, are direct dependencies on the solar rays. Through every stage of existence they are excited by those subtle agencies which are gathered together in the sunbeam; and to these influences we may trace all that beauty of development which prevails throughout the vegetable world. How few there are of even those refined minds to whom flowers are more than a symmetric arrangement of petals harmoniously colored, who think of the secret agencies forever exciting the life which is within their cells, to produce the organized structure—who reflect on the deep, yet divine philosophy, which may be read in every leaf:—those tongues in trees, which tell us of Eternal goodness and order!

The hurry of the present age is not well suited to the contemplative mind; yet, with all, there must be hours in which to fall back into the repose of quiet thought becomes a luxury. The nervous system is strung to endure only a given amount of excitement; if its vibrations are quickened beyond this measure, the delicate harp-strings are broken, or they may undulate in throbs. To every one, the contemplation of natural phenomena will be found to induce that repose which gives vigor to the mind—as sleep restores the energies of a toil-exhausted body. And to show the advantages of such a study, and the interesting lessons which are to be learned in the fields of nature, is the purpose of the present essay.

The flower is regarded as the full development of vegetable growth; and the consideration of its mysteries naturally involves a careful examination of the life of a plant, from the seed placed in the soil to its full maturity, whether it be as herb or tree.

For the perfect understanding of the physical conditions under which vegetable life is carried on, it is necessary to appreciate, in its fulness, the value of the term growth. It has been said that stones grow—that the formation of crystals was an analogous process to the formation of a leaf: and this impression has appeared to be somewhat confirmed, by witnessing the variety of arborescent forms into which solidifying waters pass, when the external cold spreads it as ice over our window panes. This is, however, a great error; stones do not grow—there is no analogy even between the formation of a crystal and the growth of a leaf. All inorganic masses increase in size only by the accretion of particles—layer upon layer, without any chemical change taking place as an essentiality. The sun may shine for ages upon a stone without quickening it into life, changing its constitution, or adding to its mass. Organic matter consists of arrangements of cells or sacks, and the increase in size is due to the absorption of gaseous matter, through the fine tissue of which they are composed. The gas—a compound of carbon and oxygen—is decomposed by the excitement produced by light; and the solid matter thus obtained is employed in building a new cell—or producing actual growth, a true function of life, in all the processes of which matter is constantly undergoing chemical change.

The simplest developments of vegetable life are the formation of conferve upon water, and of lichens upon the surface of the rock. In chemical constitution, these present no very remarkable differences from the cultivated flower which adorns our garden, or the tree which has risen in its pride amidst the changing seasons of many centuries. Each alike has derived its solid constituents from the atmosphere, and the chemical changes in all are equally dependent upon the powers which have their mysterious origin in the great centre of our planetary system.

Without dwelling upon the processes which take place in the lower forms of vegetable life, the purposes of this essay will be fully answered by taking an example from amongst the higher class of plants, and examining its conditions, from the germination of the seed to the full development of the flower—rich in form, color, and odor.

In the seed-cell we find, by minute examination, the embryo of the future plant carefully preserved in its envelope of starch and gluten. The investigations which have been carried on upon the vitality of seeds appear to prove that, under favorable conditions, this life-germ may be maintained for centuries. Grains of wheat, which had been found in the hands of an Egyptian mummy, germinated and grew; these grains were produced, in all probability, more than three thousand years since; they had been placed, at her burial, in the hands of a priestess of Isis, and in the deep repose of the Egyptian catacomb were preserved to tell us, in the eighteenth century, the story of that wheat which Joseph sold to his brethren.

The process of germination is essentially a chemical one. The seed is placed in the soil, excluded from the light, supplied with a due quantity of moisture, and maintained at a certain temperature, which must be above that at which water freezes; air must have free access to the seed, which, if placed so deep in the soil as to prevent the permeation of the atmosphere, never germinates. Under favorable circumstances, the life-quickenning processes begin; the starch, which is a compound of carbon and oxygen, is converted into sugar by the absorption of another equivalent of oxygen from the air; and we have an evident proof of this change in the sweetness which most seeds acquire in the process, the most familiar example of which we have in the conversion of barley into malt. The sugar thus formed furnishes the food to the now living creation, which, in a short period, shoots its first leaves above the soil; and these, which, rising from their dark chambers, are white, quickly become green under the operation of light.

In the process of germination, a species of slow combustion takes place, and—as in the chemical processes of animal life and in those of active ignition—carbonic acid gas, composed of oxygen and charcoal, or carbon, is evolved. Thus, by a mystery which our science does not enable us to reach, the spark of life is kindled—life commences its work—the plant grows. The first conditions of vegetable growth are, therefore, singularly similar to those which are found to prevail in the animal economy. The leaf-bud is no sooner above the soil than a new set of conditions begin; the plant takes carbonic acid from the atmosphere, and having, in virtue of its vitality, by the agency of luminous power, decomposed this gas, it retains the carbon, and pours forth the oxygen to the air. This process is stated to be a function of vitality; but, as this has been variously described by different authors, it is important to state with some minuteness what does really take place.

The plant absorbs carbonic acid from the atmosphere through the under surfaces of the leaves, and the whole of the bark; it at the same time derives an additional portion from the moisture which is taken up by the roots, and conveyed “to the top-most twig” by the force of capillary attraction, and another power called endosmosis, which is exerted in a most striking manner by living organic tissues. This mysterious force is shown in a pleasing way by covering some spirits of wine and water in a wine-glass with a piece of bladder; the water will escape, leaving the strong spirit behind.

Independently of the action of light, the plant may be regarded as a mere machine; the fluids and gases which it absorbs pass off in a condition but very little changed—just as water would strain through a sponge or a porous stone. The consequence of this is the blanching or etiolation of the plant, which we produce by our artificial treatment of celery and sea-kale—the formation of the carbonaceous compound called chlorophyle, which is the green coloring-matter of the leaves, being entirely checked in darkness. If such a plant is brought into the light, its dormant powers are awakened, and, instead of being little other than a sponge through which fluids circulate, it exerts most remarkable chemical powers; the carbonic acid of the air and water is decomposed; its charcoal is retained to add to the wood of the plant, and the oxygen is set free again to the atmosphere. In this process is exhibited one of the most beautiful illustrations of the harmony which prevails through all the great phenomena of nature with which we are acquainted—the mutual dependence of the vegetable and animal kingdoms.

In the animal economy, there is a constant production of carbonic acid, and the beautiful vegetable kingdom, spread over the earth in such infinite variety, requires this carbonic acid for its support. Constantly removing from the air the pernicious agent produced by the animal world, and giving back that oxygen which is required as the life-quickening element by the animal races, the balance of affinities is constantly maintained by the phenomena of vegetable growth. This interesting inquiry will form the subject of another essay.

The decomposition of carbonic acid is directly dependent upon luminous agency: From the impact of the earliest morning ray to the period when the sun reaches the zenith, the excitation of that vegetable vitality by which the chemical change is effected regularly increases. As the solar orb sinks towards the horizon, the chemical activity diminishes—the sun sets—the action is reduced to its minimum—the plant, in the repose of darkness, passes to that state of rest which is as necessary to the vegetating races as sleep is to the wearied animal.

These are two well-marked stages in the life of a plant; germination and vegetation are exerted under different conditions; the time of flowering arrives, and another change occurs, the processes of forming the alkaline and acid juices, of producing the oil, wax, and resin, and of secreting those nitrogenous compounds which are found in the seed, are in full activity. Carbonic acid is now evolved and oxygen is retained; hydrogen and nitrogen are also forced, as it were, into combination with the oxygen and carbon, and altogether new and more complicated operations are in activity.

Such are the phenomena of vegetable life which the researches of our philosophers have developed. This curious order—this regular progression—showing itself at well-marked epochs, is now known to be dependent upon solar influences; the works its mysterious wonders on every organic form. Much is still involved in mystery: but to the call of science some strange truths have been made manifest to man, and of some of these the phenomena must now be explained.

Germination is a chemical change which takes place most readily in darkness; vegetable growth is due to the secretion of carbon under the agency of light; and the processes of floriation are shown to involve some new and compound operations: these three states must be distinctly appreciated.

The sunbeam comes to us as a flood of pellucid light, usually colorless; if we disturb this white beam, as by compelling it to pass through a triangular piece of glass, we break it up into colored bands, which we will call the spectrum, in which we have such an order of chromatic rays as are seen in the rainbow of a summer shower. These colored rays are now known to be the sources of all the tints by which nature adorns the surface of the earth, or art imitates, in its desire to create the beautiful. These colored bands have not the same luminating power, nor do they possess the same heat-giving property. The yellow rays give the most LIGHT; the red rays have the function of HEAT in the highest degree. Beyond these properties, the sunbeam possesses another, which is the power of producing CHEMICAL CHANGE—of effecting those magical results which we witness in the photographic processes, by which the beams illuminating any object are made to delineate it upon the prepared tablet of the artist.

It has been suspected that these three phenomena are not due to the same agency, but that, associated in the sunbeam, we have LIGHT, producing all the blessings of vision, and throwing the veil of color over all things—HEAT, maintaining that temperature over our globe which is necessary to the perfection of living organisms—and a third principle, ACTINISM, by which the chemical changes alluded to are effected. We possess the power, by the use of colored media, of separating these principles from each other, and of analysing their effects. A yellow glass allows light to pass through it most freely, but it obstructs actinism almost entirely: a deep-blue glass, on the contrary, prevents the permeation of light, but it offers no interruption to the actinic, or chemical rays; a red glass, again, cuts off most of the rays, except those which have peculiarly a calorific, or heat-giving power.

With this knowledge we proceed in our experiments, and learn some of the mysteries of nature's chemistry. If, above the soil in which the seed is placed, we fix a deep pure yellow glass, the chemical change which marks germination is prevented; if, on the contrary, we employ a blue one, it is greatly accelerated; seeds, indeed, placed beneath the soil, covered with a cobalt blue finger-glass, will germinate many days sooner than such as may be exposed to the ordinary influences of sunshine;—this proves the necessity of the principle actinism to this first stage of vegetable life. Plants, however, made to grow under the influences of such blue media present much the same conditions as those which are reared in the dark; they are succulent instead of woody, and have yellow leaves and white stalks; indeed, the formation of leaves is prevented, and all the vital energy of the plant is exerted in the production of stalk. The chemical principle of the sun's rays, alone, is not therefore sufficient; remove the plant to the influence of light, as separated from actinism, by the action of yellow media, and wood is formed abundantly; the plant grows most healthfully, and the leaves assume that dark green which belongs to tropical climes or to our most brilliant summers. Light is thus proved to be the exciting agent in effecting those chemical decompositions which have already been described; but, under the influence of isolated light, it is found that plants will not flower. When, however, the subject of our experiment is brought under the influence of a red glass, particularly of that variety in which a beautifully pure red is produced by oxide of gold, the whole process of floriation and the perfection of the seed is accomplished.

Careful and long-continued observations have proved that in the spring, when the process of germination is most active, the chemical rays are the most abundant in the sunbeam. As the summer advances, light, relatively to the other forces, is largely increased; at this season, the trees of the forest, the herb of the valley, and the cultivated plants which adorn our dwellings, are all alike adding to their wood. Autumn comes on, and then heat, so necessary for ripening grain, is found to exist in considerable excess. It is curious, too, that the autumnal heat has properties peculiarly its own—so decidedly distinguished from the ordinary heat, that Sir John Herschel and Mrs. Somerville have adopted a term to distinguish it. The peculiar browning or scorching rays of autumn are called the parathermic rays: they possess a remarkable chemical action added to their calorific one; and to this are due those complicated phenomena already briefly described.

In these experiments carefully tried, we are enabled to imitate the conditions of nature, and supply, at any time, those states of solar radiation which belong to the varying seasons of the year.

Such is a rapid sketch of the mysteries of a flower. "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; and yet I say unto you, Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these."

Under the influence of the sunbeam, vegetable life is awakened, continued, and completed; a wondrous alchemy is effected; the change in the condition of the solar radiations determines the varying conditions of vegetable vitality; and in its progress those transmutations occur which at once give beauty to the exterior world, and provide for the animal races the necessary food by which their existence is maintained. The contemplation of influences such as these realises in the human soul that sweet feeling which, with Keats, finds that

"A thing of beauty is a joy forever;
Its loveliness increasing, it will never Pass into nothingness, but still will keep
A bower quiet for us, and a sleep
Full of sweet dreams, and health, and quiet breathing.

"Such the sun and moon,
Trees old and young, sprouting a shady boon
For simple sheep; and such are daffodils,
With the green world they live in."

(See Plate.)

Old men have no right to dream—
Is that the moral of your story?

—of young women. Please let us finish a maxim before you break in with interruptions. And now to commence according to the rule and formula of old established—

Once upon a time there was an old gentleman. He had buried his wife, and his children were all married and gone, even to his youngest daughter, his pet and his pride, who audaciously preferred a rattling young blade of a military lover to her dear, gouty, generally good-humored, but sometimes querulous old father. Young people have such fancies—the more shame for them; but we were all young once, even you and I, dear madam. Don't bridle, for what were the use of that nicest of Dollard's "fronts," if not to hide the incipient gray hairs? We might as well acknowledge our years, and

See ourselves as others see us.
It wad from mony a blunder free us,
An' foolish notion.

The old gentleman was not ill-looking. We have seen his portrait (and so may you, if you will turn back to the commencement of this magazine). He was fond of comfort, for which we are inclined to impute small blame to him; for all seek comfort, and some find it in being uncomfortable themselves. Others are in a state of bliss when they can make their dependents or friends miserable. And others, in a more humane spirit, actually find pleasure in denying themselves, to make other people happy. There is no accounting for tastes, except such taste as that of our old gentleman who lived once upon a time. Look at his surroundings, and then say, cynic as you may be, if Diogenes himself could refrain from exclaiming, "Now this is what I call comfortable!"

A warm evening in the summer. A shady nook where overhanging shrubbery, skilfully, but not too formally arranged, has protected the place from the noonday beams. Still, with a delicate perception of what old blood delights in, the genial and mellow rays of the setting luminary are permitted to steal in, and slightly gild the old gentleman's bald os frontis. He has been reading doubtless, some sound old author, whose word he can take without taxing his critical perceptions to guard against heresies. And he has wisely cared for a modicum of creature comfort, just enough to etherealize the mind into that half-dreamy, half-spiritual mood which is the true appreciative of the beauties of a summer afternoon.

The old gentleman has been asleep. Of what use is a book of a summer evening, if it do not serve as an opiate? Even Godey's incomparable magazine, and our very lucubrations in it, have served that purpose on occasion, and may again, many times, we hope. The old gentleman has been dreaming, and thereby hangs a tale.

He went to sleep muttering, as Betty very kindly adjusted his head to the chair back, that one of his own daughters ought to have been there to perform these little offices of kindness for him. Indeed, he did not intend to go to sleep at all, for he was determined to be cross and angry. And, to waken himself into a flagitious mood, he thrust huge pinches of snuff up his nostrils, intending thereby to irritate himself up to some desperate resolve, through the medium of his nostrils. But summer, nature, and that creature comfort, and the book, and altogether were too much for him, and though he only meant to shut his eyes and think, he shut his eyes and slept, with the open snuffbox in one hand, and a closed pinch in the other.

Betty, who knew his humor, went to her wheel. Now Betty was young, and buxom withal, very good looking, for she had a love of a face, and arms that a sculptor might envy. Her fingers were taper and pretty, for she was a housekeeper's daughter. That such mothers know well how to provide for such daughters, we might easily prove to you from many a high family's annals. Betty knew just what work she must do, not to seem to feel above her station, and yet to show that whoever should lift her above it by a matrimonial noose would do himself a comfort, and her a simple act of justice. The learned and judicious Mr. Richard Hooker, a giant in British polemics, was caught in such a trap, and bitterly he rued it. But Mr. Hooker, learned in books, was simple in the world. The certain old gentleman who lived once upon a time was the reverse of this. Still he dreamed, as we told you at the outset—and, more to his discredit, he dreamed of Betty.

Drone, drone, buzz! went the wheel. Trust me, Betty was not listening only to its hum, though that was pretty music, as you and I perhaps remember.

She cast an eye up at the old family portraits which peeped out from the hall, and thought they sneered at her. Little cared she for that, while busy fancies whispered in both ears at once a promise of my lady Betty in spite of them, and the wheel droned the same music, as plainly as Bow Bells indicated his fortune to the young Whittington, future Lord Mayor of London. So she spun on and dreamed pleasant dreams awake, while the old gentleman dreamed dreams of a mixed complexion, asleep.

He thought the bells were ringing for his marriage, and the ale was running, and the boys were shouting long life to the old gentleman who married his housekeeper's daughter, to do despite to his own kith and kin. He felt a little insulted at congratulations which in any other case of nuptial rejoicing would have been grateful, and was even inclined in his dream to quarrel with the lads who had a business to rejoice at his wedding, as if a wedding were not everybody's business. But he saw in his dream that his daughters, who seemed to be both present and absent, were offended at the rejoicings, and forthwith he changed his note, and ordered the butler to tap another barrel!

He scowled, for an impertinent fly alighted on his nose. A gentle hand brushed it away, and he smiled again; for he thought in his dream that while all the world scouted and persecuted him, the disinterested housekeeper's daughter stood between him and harm: and he dreamed—wicked old gentleman—that she folded his head to her bosom, and he cared not a rush for all the world beside. Perhaps she did place her hand upon his brow—and its velvet touch soothed him into gentle slumbers.

"A change came o'er the spirit of his dream." He thought that the bride was scoffed at, and that his daughters dared to look contemptuously upon her. His old boon companions, too, slighted the toast when "The Bride" was given, and he would have challenged them one by one "severally according to the roll," only that a lurking suspicion that he himself was an old fool, warned him to keep quiet. So he muttered in his sleep, "As good as the best of you!" and dreamed that he looked defiance on them all, and made his will, and cut his heirs off with a shilling—all but the entail. "As good as the best of you," he muttered again; and Betty, who had stopped her wheel at the first sound, sent it merrily flying round again, while a thousand happy thoughts and proud resolves danced through her head. Happy Betty!

Then the old gentleman dreamed again of his bridal guests. The mother of the new wife, where was she? He wanted to whisper to her to leave off that big bunch of keys, but her position appeared to be anomalous. She was dowager lady, housekeeper, and guest all at once, and he could not reconcile her various callings, and was troubled. He wondered in his dream—for it is remarkable what crowds of thought can be packed into an afternoon nap—he wondered in his dream if all these incongruities could ever be reconciled, and—for he thought his fate was fixed—if he ever should be comfortable and easy again!

But presently in his dream he saw something which sorely disturbed his philosophy. The village barber was among his guests! Now, the barber had once been his butler, and a great man in his household. Great men have their infirmities, and the butler had his. He was too fond of tasting; and practice, while it improved his judgment in one department of his vocation, injured him in others. So he resigned, upon a hint, and retired upon a pension, setting up an independent establishment under his old master's patronage, and still keeping the run of the hall. Moreover, he looked sweet upon the housekeeper. And she, the servants hinted, looked sweet upon him. Now the certain old gentleman might have considered all this a very good joke, under ordinary circumstances; but when one marries into a family, you know—

Was it another fly? Again Betty was compelled to leave her wheel to soothe the old gentleman. The sight of the ci-devant butler, now barber and prospective father-in-law—the curious looks of the old family servants under the new regime—the quandary whether the barber was to be addressed as John Butler, John Barber, or my lady's father-in-law.

Upon our word, such a dilemma would be a quandary for a man wide awake, and in possession of all his senses. To a dreaming man it was dreadful. It was worse than the nightmare. It was "gorgons, hydras, and chimeras dire" rolled into one big monster.

"John, go to the pantry!" shouted the certain old gentleman—that is, he dreamed he shouted.

"And I!"—said the housekeeper.

"And I!"—said the housekeeper's daughter.

And then the old gentleman, in his sleep all the time, be it understood, forgot the claims of the bride and the mother-in-law, and choleric, aimed to collar the upstart, whereupon the barber resisted, and dashed soap in his eyes! He waked with a scream. His snuffbox lay at his feet, and Betty flew to his aid, holding open his eye with her hands while she strove to blow out the angry particles with her gentle breath. She never looked prettier; but who could see that, with snuff in his eyes?

"What is the matter?" said his daughter, who just then bounced in upon him, in her travelling dress.

"MY EYE AND BETTY MARTIN," said the old gentleman, with a smile on his lips, and a tear in his eye. "I've had such dreams! I thought the bells were all ringing!"

"You may well think that," answered his daughter; "listen to them now!"

"And I thought there was a barrel of ale with the tap running on the green, and the boys shouting."

"Yes," said his daughter, "and the men too; hear them still."

"Hip! hip! hip! hurrah!" sounded in the distance.

"And I thought there was a crowd in my house—and, and, and confusion."

"So you might, for I have made the greatest tumult to get in, and should not have succeeded at all, if I did not know the way myself."

"Why, where are all our people?" asked the old man, bewildered.

"All run to hear the news, I suppose, or to tell it."

"The news? Where am I? What is it? Where's my snuffbox?"

"Here, sir," said Betty, picking it up from the ground, courtseying to the daughter as she handed the box to the father. "But the snuff is all spilled."

"Humph," growled the certain old gentleman. "And who are you? Are you Betty Martin, and nobody else?"

"Nobody else, sir," sighed Betty, with another courtesy and a tone of sad presentiment.

"Such a dream!" yawned the old gentleman. And he drew his daughter to his breast, and kissed her with a fervor of affection which surprised and delighted her. "I believe I am awake now, thank Heaven! But those bells and shouts—what is this news, daughter?"

"Bonaparte has been beaten, his army cut to pieces and broken up forever!"

"Hurrah! I could shout myself. Who brought the tidings to the village?"

"I did."

"But those bells, haven't they been ringing all day—all the afternoon, I mean?"

"Only five or ten minutes, father. I came in a chaise, and the postboy has set the villagers crazy."

"But"—but what, did not then transpire. The old gentleman left the philosophy of dreams, and the discussion thereof, until another occasion. Betty by this time having disappeared his daughter produced from her pocket THE GAZETTE EXTRAORDINARY, and pointed out to her father, who was pleased in spite of himself, the name of her husband among those who had distinguished themselves on that greatest of modern battle-fields—WATERLOO.

The wars were soon over. Betty's hopes were at an end, so she supplanted her mother, and married the ex-butler, John Barber, herself. The certain old gentleman's pet daughter was domiciled in his house again, and the ensign, her husband, vindicated her preference by becoming a general. He retired on half-pay early enough to aid his wife in comforting the last days of her father; and, after some years had passed away, the certain old gentleman ventured to tell this his dream. Whether it was the origin of the saying "My Eye and Betty Martin" or not, we are not prepared to aver; but it was certainly a good illustration.

ILLUSTRIOUS CHARACTERS

BY THOMAS WYATT, A. M.

(See Plate in August Number.)

MRS. MADISON.

THIS loved and honored lady, whose character is the subject of this brief memoir, was born in North Carolina, in the year 1767. Shortly after her birth, Mr. and Mrs. Payne, her parents, removed to Philadelphia, and joined the Society of Friends, or Quakers. Accordingly, Dolly Payne was educated in the strict system of that society to which her parents belonged; a system which, taking morality and virtue for its basis, forbids the vanities of fashionable life.

But we find it satisfactorily proved that these external accomplishments may be dispensed with without diminishing the attractions of the sex. And, although Miss Payne was not indebted to acquired graces of mind or manners, admiration and pure esteem followed her wherever she was known.

The kindness and benevolence of her disposition were the charms which fascinated her admirers, imparting a beaming grace and brightness to her countenance never to be effaced; charms which the withering hand of Time could not destroy, and which shone forth in brilliant lustre till their owner reposed in the silent tomb.

Although a strict member of the Society of Friends, she soon became the observed of all observers, for the beauty, which hereafter was destined to be so celebrated, began to attract attention; and the lovely Quakeress was soon not only the object of general admiration, but of serious and devoted attachment.

In the year 1790, this lady became the wife of John Todd, Esq., a talented young lawyer of Philadelphia, and a member also of the Society of Friends. During the lifetime of Mr. Todd, she lived in the simplicity and strictness of the society to which she belonged. But this exalted happiness was not long to be hers; death, which is ever ready to pluck the fairest flower, or sever bonds never again to be united here below, took from her side her beloved husband, after a sickness of only a few days, leaving her a young widow with an infant son.

Her mother, Mrs. Payne, of one of the oldest families of Virginia, then a widow, resided in Philadelphia, and Mrs. Todd became an inmate in her family, where congregated the good and distinguished of that day, when the worth and wisdom of the land assembled there in council to guide the destinies of our infant republic. Among the many suitors whose worth and talents were a passport to her society, was Mr. James Madison, then one of the most conspicuous members of Congress; and, in the year 1794, Mrs. Todd became the wife of that eminently great and good man. From the time of her marriage till Mr. Madison came into the administration, she lived in the full enjoyment of that abundant and cordial hospitality which characterized the wife of a Virginia gentleman. Her house was never without guests, who were freely and kindly bidden to partake of the social pleasures of the happy domestic circle. Never were circumstances more in accordance with disposition, and Mrs. Madison appeared to be in the very sphere for which nature had designed her.

In 1801, Mr. Madison was appointed Secretary of State, and removed with his family to Washington, leaving, among their Philadelphia friends, universal, kind, and pleasant recollections, which endured to the latest hour of the lives of this much honored and loved pair.

A lady, who was herself an eye-witness, gives the following description of the metropolis of the Union at that period. She says: "The infant metropolis of our country was at that time almost a wilderness. The president's house stood uninclosed on a piece of waste and barren ground, separated from the capitol by an almost impassable marsh. The building was not half completed, and standing, as it did, amidst the rough masses of stone and other materials collected for its construction, and half hidden by the venerable oaks that still shaded their native soil, looked more like a ruin in the midst of its fallen fragments and coeval shades than a new and rising edifice. The silence and solitude of the surrounding space were calculated to enforce this idea; for, beyond the capitol hill, far as the eye could reach, the city, as it was called, lay in a state of nature, covered with thick groves and forest-trees, wide and verdant plains, with only here and there a house along the intersecting ways, that could not yet be properly called streets. The original proprietors of the grounds on which the city was located, retained their rural residences and their habits of living. And new inhabitants were thronging from every part of the Union, bringing with them the primitive modes and customs of their respective States. Mr. Madison, from Virginia, Mr. Gallatin, from Pennsylvania, General Dearborn, from Massachusetts, and Robert Smith, from Maryland, were the heads of the several departments of government. These were followed by political friends and dependents, to fill the subordinate places in the several departments."

Such materials, and such unsimilarity of habits, must have given to society a most novel aspect; and nothing but their entire dependence upon each other could have formed that close and intimate circle, which became so blended together as almost to form one complete harmonious family. Mr. Jefferson, for years after his retirement, often recurred to that time, observing that the perfect unanimity that prevailed in his cabinet made him feel that they were all members of his family.

Mr. Madison held the office of Secretary of State for eight years, during which time he, with his family, resided in Washington, reciprocating civilities with all around him in the kindest manner. Much of this depended upon his lady, who, although placed, as she must have been, in a most conspicuous, and not enviable situation, conciliated the good-will of all, without offence to the numerous competitors for her interest and influence.

At a time when the restless spirit of party began to manifest itself, covering every path with thorns, this estimable woman held the branch of conciliation, ever ready to promote peace and good-will. A politician of the present day exclaimed, on a memorable occasion, "We are federalists, we are all republicans." In her intercourse with society at that day, Mrs. Madison reduced this liberal sentiment to practice; her circle was the model of polished life, and the dwelling of cheerfulness.

"When the term of Mr. Jefferson's presidency drew near its close, the spirit of political intrigue, which, for the last eight years, had lain dormant, was again roused into activity. A new president must be chosen, and there were several competitors for the people's favor. Each had their zealous and untiring partisans, who left no means unemployed to insure success. Private society felt the baneful influence of these political intrigues; social intercourse was embittered by party spirit, and personal confidence often violated. Mr. Madison was assailed with all the violence of political animosity, and calumnies were invented where facts were wanting."

Mrs. Madison, who felt the attacks on her husband with keen sensibility, always met the assailants with a mildness and condescension that disarmed their hostility of its individual rancor, and often converted political enemies into warm personal friends. The magic influence which the tender of her snuffbox exerted, won from the most obdurate a relaxation from hostility; for none partook of its contents, so graciously and kindly offered, and retained a feeling inimical to its owner.

The eventful moment arrived, and Mr. Madison was declared President of the United States.

Mr. Jefferson soon retired to Virginia, and Mr. Madison took possession of the presidential mansion.

Here, again, Mrs. Madison had an opportunity of exhibiting to advantage those high and noble feelings, which had so often triumphed over the animosity of party spirit, and gained for her husband so much popularity and good-will. But, in the third year of the presidency of Mr. Madison, our history became one of war with England; and then it was that, in this "second war of the Revolution," the energies of the nation and of her rulers were called forth.

The president was occasionally censured, with all the bitterness of party animosity; but Mr. Madison, confiding in the entire purity of his motives, and the justice of his fellow-citizens, ever left his acts to be duly estimated when the effervescence of popular excitement should subside; and, with unaltered equanimity, he continued his social intercourse with persons of all opinions.

News now arrived that the British forces had landed some miles below the city, and that the metropolis was marked for destruction.

As soon as this was known, the commanders of our army met, but were divided in their opinion as to the route to be taken; nor were they unanimous in the measures to be adopted to oppose the enemy, who were now at their doors.

General Winder, with his army, had stationed himself at Bladensburg, expecting that might be the route which the enemy would take on their way to the capitol. This had been strenuously opposed by the Secretary of War, which caused some unpleasantness at the moment.

The president, anxious to settle this unhappy difference, went himself, accompanied by several members of the cabinet and other personal friends, to Bladensburg, where they, to their great surprise, found the two armies preparing to engage.

Being so near the city, the inhabitants were much alarmed for the result of the battle, and all the dismay attendant on a besieged city displayed itself among the unarmed citizens.

The sound of the cannon was distinctly heard. The cabinet party, who had gone to hold a council of war, had now been absent two days, and no signs of their return. The whole city was in confusion. The few friends remaining with Mrs. Madison urged her to leave the city; but she peremptorily refused, even if she was taken prisoner, till she was assured of Mr. Madison's safety. The carriage was several times brought to the door; but they could not prevail on her to enter it until her husband's return. The following extract from a letter to her sister, written in all the tumult and confusion which surrounded her, shows her attachment for her husband, and her firm patriotism to her country:—

"Tuesday, Aug. 23, 1814.

"DEAR SISTER: My husband left me yesterday morning to join General Winder. He was anxious to know if I had courage or firmness to remain in the president's house until his return; and, on my assurance that I had no fear but for him and the success of our brave army, he left me, beseeching me to take care of myself, and of the cabinet papers, public and private. I have since received two dispatches from him, written in pencil; the last is alarming: he desires I should be ready, at a moment's warning, to enter my carriage and leave the city; that the enemy seemed stronger than had been reported, and that it might happen they would reach the city and destroy it. I am, accordingly, ready. I have pressed as many cabinet papers into trunks as to fill one carriage; our private property must be sacrificed, as it is impossible to procure wagons for its transportation. I am determined not to go myself until I see Mr. Madison safe, and he can accompany me, as I hear of much hostility towards him. My friends and acquaintances are all gone, even Colonel C., with his hundred men, who were stationed as a guard in this inclosure. French John—a faithful domestic—with his usual activity and resolution, offers to spike the cannon at the gate, and to lay a train of powder which would blow up the British, should they enter the house. To the last proposition I positively object, without being able, however, to make him understand why all advantages in war may not be taken.

“Wednesday morning, 12 o'clock. Since sunrise, I have been turning my spy-glass in every direction, and watching with unwearied anxiety, hoping to discern the approach of my dear husband and his friends; but, alas! I can only descry groups of military wandering in all directions, as if there was a lack of arms, or of spirit to fight for their own firesides!

“Three o'clock. Will you believe it, my dear sister? we have had a battle, or skirmish, near Bladensburg, and I am still here within sound of the cannon! Mr. Madison comes not; may God protect him! Two messengers covered with dust come to bid me fly; but I shall wait for him.

“— At this late hour, a wagon has been procured; I have had it filled with the plate and most valuable portable articles belonging to the house. Whether it will reach its destination, the Bank of Maryland, or fall into the hands of the British soldiery, events must determine. Our kind friend, Mr. Carroll, has come to hasten my departure, and is in very bad humor with me because I insist on waiting until the large portrait of General Washington is secured, and it requires to be unscrewed from the wall. This process was found too tedious for these perilous moments. I have ordered the frame to be broken, and the canvas taken out, and it is done, and the precious relic placed in the hands of two gentlemen for safe keeping. And now, my dear sister, I must leave this house, or the retreating army will make me a prisoner in it, by filling up the road I am directed to take. When I shall write you again, or where I shall be to-morrow, I cannot tell!”

With a few devoted friends around her, Mrs. Madison left the house, and joined her husband a few miles from the city, to return in a few days.

The president's house having been destroyed by the enemy meanwhile, the elegant and commodious residence of Colonel Tayloe became for a time the presidential mansion; and, subsequently, the two south-east corner houses of the “Seven Buildings,” now standing on Pennsylvania Avenue, were made the abodes of hospitality until the 4th of March, 1817, when, having seen his successor, James Monroe, of Virginia, inaugurated President of the United States, Mr. and Mrs. Madison, after a long service of virtue and usefulness, retired to the shades of Montpelier, his paternal residence, in Orange County, Virginia.

Mr. Madison scrupulously refrained, after his retirement, from all interference in the politics of the nation; but enjoyed, in his abode of sylvan beauty and mountain salubrity, the visits of guests of distinction from every clime, who sought the patriot and the sage, that they might testify personally that respect and regard which his eminent services and the purity of his character universally inspired.

Here, in retirement, as in public, the equal virtues of Mrs. Madison conciliated the warmest regard from all around her; and, in the dispensation of an elegant and enlightened hospitality, she gladdened the evening of her husband's days by her attention to his friends and guests, while her anxious watchfulness of him, best known in the domestic circle, are perhaps better described in the following lines, inscribed to grateful recollections:—

MONTPELIER.

Here, at this gate, the swelling sylvan range,
The stately mansion with its pictured halls
I'll bid adieu. Perhaps this is the last
Of all this excellence that life may lend
Me time to look upon. Here, let me stand
And look, and say, even from my inward heart,
Peace be within these walls—the peace of Heaven!
May it forever reign within your breasts,
Ye gentle inmates of that honored roof!
Never two purer hearts, amid the lands
And varying climes I've known, have I observed.
Thrice blest and honored they, whom even age
Adorns with brighter excellence, in whom Fidelity, mutual respect, and love,
And mutual tenderness unite. Behold
That noble dame! see her gracious bearing,
The cordial welcome to her numerous friends!
Observe her zeal, her hospitable cares;
But mark the keen solicitude, the thought,
Constant, ever to him, there, where he lies
Alive in an immortal spirit, though
The lofty cares of more than fourscore years
His sinews have unstrung. Each day she lives
But for to watch over his precious life;
Soft is the pillow from her careful hand!
Never was a man more blessed in such a wife;
Never was a wife more honored in her mate.
Hail, MADISON! among the noble sons
Fearless, of fair Virginia's soil;

Of all its generous children, first art thou,
 Save for the memory of him whose name
 Shines above all men's names; in whom the love
 Of country and of virtue far surpassed
 The love of life. He, whose glorious days men
 Where Christendom extends, by one consent,
 Have hailed the type of human excellence:
 A glass for men to look in, when they need
 To curb the wild ambition that weak minds
 Lead oft astray, and makes historic names
 The curse and shame of human annals, when
 They might be gems like that of WASHINGTON.
 His great example was not lost on thee,
 Whose life has passed in loyalty to truth.
 The tree of liberty, planted by him,
 Well hast thou nurtured; now, its spreading boughs
 Give shade to all; and thou shalt be revered
 Whilst time shall last. Forever shall our sons Raise in this land the honored names
 Of WASHINGTON and MADISON, the types
 Of human wisdom, patriot probity.
 Blest be thy future days! long may'st thou live
 To love thy friends, to know how much thou'rt loved!
 Long may the wisdom of all ages past
 Oft, from thy gentle lips and hallowed heart,

Be poured into the listening ears of men
 As mine have drank it in. And when thy sun
 Declines, at length, into the golden west,
 To rise refulgent to a brighter day,
 May thy immortal mind still turn to God,
 Bearing thee onward in thy course to heaven.

After the death of her husband, Mrs. Madison continued to reside at Montpelier until 1837, with the exception of part of each winter, which she generally spent in Washington; till, finally, in 1843, she made that city her permanent residence, enjoying uninterrupted good health till within five days of her death, which took place on the 13th day of July, 1849, at the advanced age of eighty-two years.

Without disease, she rapidly sank from age and exhaustion into the grave, in hope of a joyful resurrection.

Her remains were deposited temporarily in the receiving-vault in the Congressional burying-ground, till they could be conveyed to Montpelier, in Virginia, to repose by the side of her illustrious husband.

HOW WE SPENT THREE DAYS IN CONSTANTINOPLE, AND HOW WE LEFT IT:

BEING SOME PAGES FROM THE JOURNAL OF AN ORIENTAL TRAVELLER.

BY A. B. MIDDLETOWN PAYNE.

THE sun was just disappearing in the horizon, on Thursday evening, when the anchors of the lumbering Austrian merchant vessel "Presburg" plunged into the calm blue waters of the Bosphorus. The domes and minarets of the "City of the Sultan" were tipped with the last beams of day, and the twilight breezes were sighing through the branches of the cypresses that sweep down, in thick and solemn clusters, to the water's edge, in the vast cemetery of Pera, not far from which the ship had hove to.

Hailing a passing caique, guided by a single athletic Turk, we descended on board of her, literally, I believe, for I do not think there was much more than that between our feet and the water. However, I would have been glad enough to leave the vessel on a chip, and I labor under the impression that my travelling companion, Grey, had precisely the same feeling. Now, let it be understood that there is no such thing to be done, in any way compatible with safety, as to leap on to a caique; for a suddenly-jerked-on weight would infallibly sink the frail boat, or go through it. They appear to float in accordance with some, as yet, undiscovered principle, and their extreme needle-like narrowness makes them fly through the water like—what shall I say?—a hot knife through fresh butter?—similies are scarce nowadays; the motion is not unlike that of an eel trying to escape from a fisherman's hand—a wriggle and a jerk.

We took nothing with us from the ship but a portmanteau apiece, and a letter of introduction to Monsieur L——n, a French gentleman resident in Pera, which had been kindly given to us by his brother-in-law, to whom we had been introduced at Venice. Our heavy baggage was to be sent on shore the next morning with our three servants, the brothers Boyd.

Grey and I now summoned up all our powers of Turkish conversation—limited to six sentences which had been taught us by the Austrian captain, and a seventh, which we had ourselves manufactured by dint of great perseverance and research, from the others—and practised upon our boatman instead of addressing him in Armenian, which we both understood and spoke pretty decently, I flatter myself. "Can you take us to the quay of Tophanna?" I commenced. "Yes." "Are there many Franks in Stamboul now?" "A good many." This we did not understand at the time, but treasured up the pronunciation, so that we might inquire, at the first opportunity, what it meant. "Is the Sultan in Stamboul?" asked Grey. Another unintelligible reply; for we had always been taught not to expect more than a "Yes," or a "No," from so unloquacious a personage as a Turk : but our boatman was quite a lively specimen, to say the least of him ; and, for aught we know, might have been exercising himself in the Yankee trick of answering one question by asking another.

There was a pause which was interrupted by our gondolier saying something which, from the intonation, we found to be a question. This called for the use of the fourth sentence in our extensive vocabulary—"I do not understand you," in consequence of which he explained himself at length, much to our bewilderment, but the last word solved the mystery—"backschisch !" A handful of paras, with which the captain had supplied us, was all-sufficient, and on turning round, we found that the caïque was close to the landing-place.

Five minutes after, we were picking our way along the narrow, dark, and extremely dirty streets of the quarter Galata, under the guidance of a Greek dragoman, who had proffered his services on our quitting the caïque. Soon, we were snugly ensconced in two very comfortable chairs of Parisian make, and were partaking of an admirable supper at the table of Monsieur L——n, whose residence, having been built expressly to suit his French taste, was the fac-simile of a civilized dwelling, and was reputed to be one of the most elegant in Pera. We forgot in a short time that we were "strangers in a strange land," and the family party—I might almost call it so—did not break up until quite late.

I was awakened at sunrise the next morning by the loud voices of the muessins, calling the faithful to prayer, from the lofty minarets of the innumerable mosques in the city. Although the tones were excessively harsh and discordant, there was still something more solemn in this manner of proclaiming to the sleepers their duty, than if a bell had been tolled from the airy galleries.

Having but three days to stay in Constantinople, in accordance with our preconcerted arrangements, we were obliged to bestir ourselves in order to get ready for our travels through Asia Minor. Monsieur L——n was kind enough to offer his services in assisting us, and also in showing us through the city, in consequence of which last promise we set out quite early in the morning under his direction. It was Friday, the Mohammedan Sabbath, and it was therefore useless to pass through the bazaars, as the shops would all be closed. Avoiding them, Monsieur L——n led us to the banks of the Golden Horn, and, entering a highly ornamented and beautiful caïque, we shot across to Constantinople proper.

From the water, the view of the city was beautiful beyond description : the numerous brilliantly-decorated domes, surrounded by the tall sky-reaching minarets of red and white stone, with their transparent galleries of pierced marble, rose high above the encompassing crowd of picturesque wooden houses, and encircling groves of plane-trees and cypresses. Everything seemed bright and clean ; but this proved, on landing, to be a false impression, the streets being extremely narrow, horrifically dirty, and the houses of most tarnished appearance. Hailing an empty araba—all gilding and discomfort—that was being led slowly along by its driver, we entered it and were jolted through the indescribably rough streets in a vehicle without springs, pulled by two oxen not remarkable for their size, cleanliness, or respectable appearance, although I suppose that they, as well as the araba, belonged to an acquaintance of Monsieur L——n's, as the slave seemed to recognize him.

The first place we alighted in was the Atmeidan (or Hippodrome), on one side of which stands the Mosque of the Sultan Achmet, a splendid erection, remarkable for being the only sacred edifice in the Mohammedan world that possesses six minarets ;—that at Mecca has now seven, although originally but four, the other three having been added in consequence of the Sultan Achmet having received (or bought) permission to increase—in that which he was having built—the usual number by two, it not being considered proper that a subsidiary place of worship should have more than the great head. Being "giacours," we were not permitted to enter any of the mosques without a firman, which we had not, so we were obliged to content ourselves with a mere exterior view, although on our return to Constantinople the following year, we not only visited the "Sultan Achmet," but also the "Sancta Sophia" and the "Solemanie."

In the Atmeidan there is an obelisk of Egyptian granite, brought from Rhodes by the Emperor Theodosius, who put it on a white marble pedestal covered with bassi reliefs of the worst possible execution, depleting his majesty's victories ; the sculptor was undoubtedly a conqueror also, as he has left undeniable evidences of his having utterly vanquished the rules of art. No matter, it's good enough for barbarians.

Not far from this relic stands the spiral column of bronze, once terminating in three serpents' heads, one of which is said to have been struck off at a single blow by the sword of the Sultan Achmet. This pillar is also reported to have once supported the tripod of the Delphic goddess, and—yet again—to be the identical column that was presented by the Greeks to the oracle of that town after the battle of Plateæ. I suppose that one is at liberty to credit as much and as many of the above traditions as he pleases ; but there is a fourth, in which the Turks place implicit and unquestioning belief : it is that when this pillar shall be removed from its present position, the Christians will regain the mastery of Constantinople ; at which period a walled-up chamber in the Mosque of Sancta Sophia is to open of its own accord, and a Greek bishop (who has been praying in it, with a missal upon which no Moslem eye may rest, ever since the commencement of the Mohammedan supremacy), will come out and chant the service at the high altar. This will undoubtedly happen, if he is in there—and he will have excellent reason to give thanks after so long an imprisonment.

About a hundred yards from the bronze tripod is the unsightly column of Constantine, nothing more than a rudely-constructed pillar, ninety feet in height, of unwhewn stones of all shapes and sizes. None of the metal which once covered it now remains.

We next proceeded to examine the exterior of the Mosque of Sancta Sophia, and having done so, left it, grumbling at the Moslem bigotry that prevented us from entering its beauteous gates. In the afternoon, we visited the quarter of Fanar, the residence of the principal Greek families in Stamboul, who are called Fanariotes. I was told that they speak a language remarkable for its resemblance to the tongue of Ancient Greece; but I was unable to encounter a single individual of the race, as they hold themselves much aloof from strangers.

Monsieur L——n assisted us, on the following day, in preparing for our journey through Asia Minor, and informed us that, as the Archbishop of Broussa was then at Constantinople, we had merely to ask him for a letter to the Armenian convents on the Mounts of Bemdar, and we would be sure to have our request complied with. We accordingly waited on his holiness, and were received with the utmost urbanity and politeness, being dismissed, after an hour's conversation, with an assurance that a letter should be sent us by the time of our intended departure.

On Sunday we visited the immense cemeteries in the neighborhood of Pera. The thousands of tombs with their turbaned pillars, overshadowed by the yew and cypress; the women in their black silk gowns and impenetrable veils, pouring libations on some of the mausoleums, on the anniversary of their bereavement; the fresh garlands of flowers laid on the marble slabs—all tended to give me a deeper reverence for the Moslems in general than I had ever before experienced. They at least do not forget their dead.

In the same evening (Sunday) we went to a musical entertainment at Signor F——i's, an Italian gentleman residing in the neighborhood of Monsieur L——n's house. We retired soon, as we wished to prepare for an early departure the next morning.

We were up before sunrise on Monday, and, together with our regular travelling attendants, the three brothers Boyd, and five Armenian supernumeraries, were soon busily engaged in making our final dispositions for leaving the "City of the Sultan;" and these were not very extensive, consisting principally of the cramming of the greatest possible number of habiliments into the most diminutive saddle-bags I ever met with, for we had no animals beside those which we rode, as we did not wish to incur ourselves with superfluous annoyances. Monsieur L——n kindly undertook to forward the greater part of our baggage to Smyrna by sea, and thus relieved us of the trouble of carrying a large quantity of unnecessary luggage through Asia Minor.

At six o'clock we were all ready to start, when it was suddenly remembered that the Archbishop of Broussa had not sent us the letter he had promised. This was very delightful, as without it we did not stand a particularly good chance of obtaining an entrance into the several monasteries we had decided upon invading for the purpose of ransacking their libraries. What was to be done? Nothing, but to send a message to his holiness, and so we determined to employ Ned Grey as stirrer-up. To do this it was necessary to borrow a horse, as all of ours were waiting for us at Scutari, on the other side of the Bosphorus. Monsieur L——n had one of his saddled instantly; but as Grey was mounting, the letter came in the care of one of the archbishop's household, with an apology for its not having been sooner sent. Of course, "it was of no consequence," and, so saying, we placed the saddle-bags in a two-wheeled vehicle (I don't know exactly what to call it, a wagon, a dray, or something else) drawn by an extremely attenuated donkey, that would have been a prize to a student studying anatomy.

We permitted the curious conveyance to precede us, attended by the Armenians, for the fact was we were ashamed to be seen in its company even by the dirty, shabby Constantinopolitans, and so we followed at a respectful distance, accompanied by our late host. Passing through the market-place of "Tophanna," (which means nearly the same as "Arsenal,") we took a peep at the beautiful fountain, and the exterior of the mosque of Sultan Selim, one of the beauties of the Pera side of the Golden Horn. By its side, toward the water, is the quay of Tophanna, where the cannon are kept—ready for service, too, as was proved one night, some time ago, the pier having been set on fire during an insurrection of the Janissaries. The flames discharged the ready-loaded cannon, sending the balls whizzing over to Scutari, where the populace were dreadfully alarmed, thinking that the Greeks had revolted, seized the arsenal, and were bombarding the city. Such, however, was not the case, as the reader knows, and the petty cause of all the fright was soon quelled.

Near the quay was the calque we had engaged the day before; and, the saddle-bags being transferred to it, the indescribable vehicle was hobbled away with by the anatomical donkey, much to our satisfaction, and we entered the boat, being landed in a short time at Scutari, after having had a glance at that curious island structure called indiscriminately the Maiden's, or Leander's Tower; the Turkish name is Kiz Kouklasi, of which the interpretation is the first of the above given appellations.*

* The derivation of "Kiz Kouklasi" is evident, being

By the side of the landing-place at Scutari rises the mosque of Buyeck D'Jami; it has a gallery running all around its exterior walls, and has a remarkably small dome for so extensive a structure: it also prides itself in possessing two singularly beautiful minarets, while the adjacent fountain is a triumph of arabesque sculpture.

We found the horses at the appointed spot, and were soon ready to start. Monsieur L——n now took leave of us and returned to Pera, while we set off on our expedition, taking the route to Ismid. The road was not very bad, and by six in the evening we had reached the caravanserai* of Jub Gannoun, about twenty-seven miles from Scutari, where we spent the night in company with uncountable fleas, who, by our subsequent sensations, must have made a far better supper than we managed to procure.

A slight detention on the route prevented us from reaching Ismid until quite late on Tuesday evening. I imagined we did not lose much in not seeing the town, as it is very small and frightfully the converse of clean, if the khan† we put up at may be taken as a specimen, or if my olfactories did not play me a trick as we rode through the place.

Now I am sorry that I have no adventures to relate as having occurred to me on the road from Scutari to the Monastery of Abrodol (the first on our not very long list); but, as I have before said, I seldom or never have the good luck to meet with any, and at present I cannot remember a single one, among the legions that are generally supposed to have happened to previous travellers, that would serve to introduce here, or I might appropriate it, with some little alterations. Such being the case, I will run through this part of our journey much quicker than our horses carried us, and merely mention our crossing the River Saccaria (or Aiala), on Thursday morning.

We arrived on its banks late on Wednesday evening, and, with the sun of the following day, searched for a fordable spot, which, after many failures, we found about a mile further south. The Armenians plunged boldly in and crossed with the greatest ease; Harry Boyd followed, and my turn came next.

I spurred up my horse, but he did not wish to go in, having no fancy for a cold bath so soon after breakfast. He kicked and plunged, unfortunately not into the water, and waltzed away as if a German born, but in he would not go: he was in a perfect tantrum, and it was with the utmost difficulty that I managed to quiet him sufficiently to turn him round. At length I succeeded in doing so, and backed him gently into the river. As soon as the water touched his fetlocks, he must needs take another prance; but I rapidly caused him to head the stream. Then, with a vigorous pass at him with my spurs, and a crack over his back with my portable fishing-rod—I had no whip—I forced him to dance into the water, which he did not approve of at all, and, with as many turnings and twistings as possible, he contrived to get to the middle of the Saccaria, where he stopped short. Nothing would budge him, and to avoid the water I was screwed up nearly on top of the saddle, looking “for all the world” like an awkward circus-rider. Several pokes with the end of my fishing-rod had no more effect than a willow bough, and I was in an agreeable situation, internally wishing the horse and the Saccaria at the North Pole. There was Grey on one bank laughing to kill himself, and on the other the five Armenians grinning like monkeys and showing their superb set of teeth to the best advantage. At length one of these took pity on me, and, re-entering the stream, whispered some Armenian words in the horse's ear, who instantly became docile, and permitted me to direct him to the opposite bank, Grey and the two Boyds following.

Now, I was no believer in charms, but still I felt curious to know what the Armenian had said to the horse; so, beckoning him aside, I inquired. He could not tell, it was a secret (between him and the horse, doubtless); but a piastre brought it out. Taking me a little way from the rest of the party, and carefully looking round to see that none was within eaves-dropping distance, he murmured in the lowest possible tone of voice, and with an air of the greatest secrecy and seriousness, “I said, ‘O horse! if thou wilt be ridden in peace across these waters, Allah will reward thee, and I, O horse! will give thee, at our first halt, an extra measure of oats!’” Think, O gentle reader! how this unhappy individual was humbugged out of a piastre! Justice, however, should be rendered to the Armenian, for he fulfilled his promise, that is, he took the money to purchase the grain.*

A little before noon we checked our horses at the foot of the precipice, on the summit of which was doubtless a corrupt pronunciation of “Kiss you, Isary,” a sentence that Leander may easily be supposed to have frequently addressed to the fair Hero.

The origin of the name of the surrounding waters is equally clear: “Buss for us,” which, in course of time, has come to be mispronounced “Bosphorus.”

* Caravan-seraï means caravan-house, and is a large building, capable of accommodating with ease two or three of the huge assemblies of merchants that are continually crossing the country. They are consequently placed on the great routes, at the distance of a day's journey from each other.

† A khan is a small tavern, to be found in every village, for the accommodation (?) of single travellers, or parties of ten or twelve merchants, where the “guest” has to be his own “chief cook and bottle-washer,” provided he can find any clean water.

* It may be as well to remark here that I afterwards discovered the horse to have been subdued by the Armenian's compressing the animal's nostrils in a peculiar manner, which, however, is kept strictly secret.

the Monastery of Arodol, whose gray, time-worn walls looked like a continuation of the sheer cliff that rose before us to the height of over a hundred and fifty feet. Old wooden ladders formed the only apparent means of access, if such, indeed, they could be called, for they were evidently unable to bear the weight of a man, provided he could find a foothold on the rough rounds, that were so close to the face of the ascent that they seemed to be pasted on it like engravings in a scrap-book. It was indisputable that a horse could not walk up them, and we began to doubt whether any of the monks had made use of them for a month of Sundays, or, in fact, if any of those highly respectable recluses were in the land of the living, for all our shouts and screams and gunshots made no more impression on the ears of the fraternity than upon the cliff itself.

We began to think that we might as well dine, and then proceed upon our journey, when a chance glance upwards displayed to my view an open shutter in a little tower that overhung a corner of the monastic walls, out of which were stretched the head, shoulders, and arms of an old black-capped gentleman, who was gesticulating vehemently, and I presume shouting to us, as his mouth was opening and shutting with unprecedented velocity. We jumped up and flourished our letters of introduction from the archbishop of Broussa and the Greek patriarch, which last had been procured for us by a friend in Jerusalem.

This caused the instant disappearance of the old human windmill, who, however, returned to his post, after a few moments' delay, in a very flourishing condition, giving place to a long rope, one end of which was soon dangling in our faces. No sooner did this take place than the Armenians plunged at a strong net that was firmly attached to the rope, and, spreading it out, were about to roll me up in it, when suddenly it was twitched out of their grasp and reach. This curious manoeuvre made us raise our eyes to the window, where the animated windmill was turning round a piece of paper. We understood this as a requisition for our letters, which we again produced, and, the rope descending, sent them up for inspection before the high tribunal, not without some misgivings in regard to the safety of such a course. But we were soon reassured by the net's coming down once more, without the documents, which we accepted in the light of an invitation to ascend.

I lay down full length on the net, and was soon bundled up in it like David Copperfield in his aunt's shawls. Being tied up tight, with nothing free but my arms and head, the Armenians gave the signal, and the monks began slowly to draw me up, during which operation I inwardly vowed never to catch fish again, as I participated in their feelings on leaving their native element. This was before I had got twenty-five feet above the ground; but, when about twice that distance, the sway of the rope began to be very distinctly felt, making my sensations anything rather than agreeable, as it turned round and round. At length I felt so faint and sick that I could scarcely retain presence of mind sufficient to keep myself clear of the cliff by the use of my invaluable fishing-rod. I was nearly two-thirds of the way up when I became conscious that, owing to these exertions, the fastenings of the net were giving way. I clung to the rope instinctively; the vibrations continued, though I quickly neared the monastery walls: I was, however, afraid to use my fishing-rod, and in a second I jarred heavily against the cliff, becoming insensible.

When I recovered my faculties, I was lying on a floor of a small square room filled with monks; Harry Boyd was holding my head; Grey was by my side, while the affrighted faces of two of the Armenians completed the group. I soon found that I was not dead, but in the turret, and in a few moments several athletic monks had pulled up the other two Boyds, the rest of the Armenians remaining below to take charge of the horses.

I was considerably bruised by my encounter with the cliff, and it was two or three days before I was able to leave the dormitory which the kind and attentive brotherhood had assigned for my use; but once recovered, I turned my thoughts toward thinning the library of the monastery by removing the most valuable manuscripts at the lowest possible outlay. Such is the gratitude of human nature!

But it is time for me to break off, as I have more than related "How we spent three days in Constantinople, and how we left it."

STANZAS.

BY J. SCOTT WILSON, M.D.

WHEN wearied in a faithless world,
Who would not wish to soar,
And seek, beyond the gems of night,
Some more congenial shore?
Where all is change, no lasting joys
Can crown the gayest hours;
The dearest hopes despair allays,
And fade the fairest flowers.

Where formal friendships fade so soon,
There love is but a ray,
That ne'er dispels the clouds above,
Nor warms life's wintry day.
'Tis but a gleam, a dazzling gleam,
Athwart the path of life,
Which but illumines our sorrows here,
To leave a darker strife!

But, tolls no more—life's sorrows done—
The aching heart at rest,
The sinless soul shall find a home
Afar amid the blest:
Then Hope no more, with siren tongue,
Shall sing of ideal bliss;
For, there forgot, in that far land,
Will be the cares of this.

ELLEN MONTROSE.

BY MARIE JEANNETTE.

To properly commence our story, we must accompany the fair Ellen as she enters, unannounced, her sister's elegant home, in one of the most beautiful streets of our gay city, where her welcome is proclaimed in joyous tones by a group of many children, to whom Aunt Ellen's arrival is always a joy. After a time devoted to their amusement, the little group is dispersed, each member of it laden with a portion of their aunt's attire, marshalled by Master Charles, who, with her muff surmounting his brow, fancied himself a most perfect grenadier; and, determining to enjoy fully the pleasure of this fancy, resolutely closes the door of the apartment they entered, and placing himself as sentinel, announced his determination to make them all stay with him and play soldier as long as he pleases. Leaving them to the enjoyment of their unwilling parade, we return to the ladies, Ellen and Heloise, the mother of these little ones, who gladly avail themselves of the opportunity for an uninterrupted conversation.

"You would not have seen me to-day," said Ellen; "but I was depressed in spirits, and thought I would come and have a romp with the children and a talk with you. Were you ever dull or sad when you were engaged, sister?"

"It is so long since then that I scarce recollect," replied Heloise, smiling. "But I believe, as the time fixed for my nuptials approached, I realized more fully the importance of the responsibilities I was incurring, and sometimes almost feared to fulfil my promises to Charles. It is but natural, Ellen; a young girl cannot enter upon duties of so serious a nature as those of married life, without many misgivings as to her own ability for their fulfilment; nor would it be well otherwise. It is an important change, and should be thought of as such."

"It is, indeed, sister, a very important event, and I assure you I realize it as such. But come, Heloise, honor bright," continued Ellen, glancing slyly with her merry black eyes, "did you ever wish you had not engaged yourself?"

"Did I ever really wish such a thing, Ellen, do you ask?" inquired Heloise, in a tone of surprise, looking earnestly at her sister. "No, surely, I never did."

"There, sister, don't be alarmed, and return me my question with your eyes," said Ellen, as she read aright the expression of her sister's face; "and do not be shocked at my question; I only asked to tease you. I know your attachment to Charles was of too romantic and devoted a nature to admit the possibility of such a supposition for an instant; and that look of astonishment at my question would have answered me without a word, had I really doubted you. But what a beautiful bouquet you have here!" rising, and seeking, by her admiration of the flowers, not only to hide her confusion under the penetrating gaze of her sister, but also to change the conversation.

"Yes, they are beautiful," answered Heloise, on whose face was now settled an anxious, thoughtful look. "Charles culled them before he left this morning. If you will, you may have them."

"Thank you, sister, you are really kind; and, since you are so generous, I will gladly yield to my selfishness, and accept them." As she spoke, Ellen stood for some moments before the splendid mirror that filled the pier, and seemed to be occupied in arranging some of the flowers in her hair.

While she thus stood, Heloise regarded her attentively, and there was silence for some moments, unbroken save by the voice of Master Charles, as he marched in the adjoining room, officiating in the double capacity of leader and trumpeter; and then Heloise, addressing Ellen, was the first to speak—

"And so you were dull to-day, and thought to amuse yourself by teasing your unoffending sister, my dear Ellen?"

"Oui, ma chère sœur; and I have the satisfaction of knowing that I completely effected my purpose," was the laughing reply of Ellen, who now sought earnestly to divert her sister's attention from the cause of her dulness.

"Yes, my sister, you have succeeded, as I must own. I am annoyed; but," said Heloise, in a serious tone, "not so much by your question, as by the motive which I fear prompted it."

For a moment Ellen was silent; the color mounted to her cheeks and temples, as she saw that her sister's penetration had rendered candor on her part inevitable; then, casting aside all reserve, she ingeniously asked—

"And what have you discovered, dear Heloise, beyond my simple question?"

"That there is some feeling of uneasiness at your heart, at present, which prompted it, and which, if I may know, I would," replied Heloise.

"You are right, sister; I have had feelings and fears of late that have given me discomfort, and I am now glad to speak of them to you, as to no one else would I breathe them."

"Well, Ellen, as the course of true love never yet ran smooth, I shall expect to hear of some very dreadful occurrence," said Heloise, jestingly; yet a keen observer might detect much anxiety under this assumed gayety. "I suppose Louis and yourself have quarrelled, and are both too proud to make the first acknowledgment, and be friends again."

"Not so, sister, I assure you," replied Ellen. "Louis is unwavering in love and kindness, ever the same. It is I who have changed, if change there be, since our engagement was made."

"You do not mean, surely, that you love him less, or not at all?" eagerly asked Heloise.

"No, no, Heloise, do not mistake me; I could not love him more than I do, and I believe, were anything to occur to prevent our marriage, my life would be one desolate blank. But, sister, I do fear at times for his future happiness with me, as well as for my own. It is this that makes me melancholy."

"Why should you fear, Ellen? Are there any particular reasons for your anxiety?"

"Yes, Heloise, there are many; our dispositions are so different, and so unlike. I would be gay, and partake of every enjoyment, regardless of consequences; while he prefers quiet, seeks but social pleasures, and would not swerve from the strict line of duty and principle for an instant for any motive upon earth. Somehow, I shrink from the life of privation I fear will commence with my marriage."

"Why you should picture to yourself a life of privation, I cannot think, Ellen. Louis St. Clair is engaged in a very lucrative business, which, with care, should enable him to live handsomely, and, in a few years, renounce altogether its pursuits."

"Yes, yes," interrupted Ellen, hastily, "with care; these are the very words that annoy me. I cannot bear the thought of constant care as to the indulgence of this or that wish, and I really sometimes dread the future."

"What is there in being properly careful so very terrifying to my little sister?" asked Heloise. "Surely you are not such a child, Ellen, as to expect to go through life as through a highly cultivated garden, culling only the choicest flowers, unconscious of the existence of a single weed? You must have holier, higher, deeper views of life in its reality."

"I hope I have, Heloise; but, for all that, it is life in its realities I shrink from; and I have discovered very lately that Louis, with all his love, is not blind to my imperfections. He has discerned that I am changeable in my purposes; a discovery I never made myself, and which, although I cannot deny, I do not feel obliged to him for observing."

"Then, Ellen, you should begin at once to remedy what you acknowledge to be a defect in your character, and be really thankful you have been made aware of it in time to do so before it affect, in the slightest manner, the happiness of others than yourself. You know your every wish has hitherto been indulged, and life has been one uninterrupted day of pleasure; but, in now assuming the duties of the married state, you must expect to undergo the vicissitudes of time with womanly courage, hope, and confidence."

"Yes, my dear Heloise, I suppose I should; but precisely as my life has hitherto been a pleasant one, and my every wish almost a law immediately obeyed, do I dislike the task of remodelling my disposition to suit any one; and I fear me, if Louis has already discovered faults, his discerning eye will, in all probability, detect others quite as glaring." Rising hastily, as she spoke, Ellen paced the room with a cloud upon her usually gay countenance.

"Well, Ellen; and does his manner betray less of love since then?" asked Heloise. "Man usually loves most that which requires his guidance; his pride being gratified by the implied acknowledgment of superiority it gives to rely upon him. Believe me, your changeable disposition will suit him better, if he is firm, than if you were more like him; although I would not have you childishly fickle either: your own good sense must guide you; and remember, Ellen, that, above all other qualities in a wife, amiability is most commendable. Come, clear your brow, I want to see you smile again; you are only too happy, and cannot realize it."

"Perhaps so, sister," answered Ellen; "and the idea of quarrelling with my own happiness is so ridiculous, that I cannot avoid smiling at it. The eventful day is near at hand, and I only hope we will never regret it."

"You surely never will, Ellen, if you act wisely yourself. I do candidly believe that a woman may be happy or unhappy after marriage, as she herself wills it; that is, where there is love to guide both."

"Yes, sister, I know you think so," interrupted Ellen, as she now resumed herself; "and, as you endow the wife with such supreme power, I hope to verify your belief in my own practice. You have effectually banished the misgivings I entertained lately, and I shall trust implicitly to your assurances for the future. But where are the children? We have forgotten them." And, rising hastily, Ellen liberated the captives under the command of Charles.

Leaving her to participate in their innocent mirth, we will now introduce more fully to our readers the characters with whom they should become acquainted; commencing, of course, with our heroine, Ellen, of whose position and prospects in life we have already spoken. The daughter, and the youngest, too, of wealthy parents, she had been indulged in every wish, and her frank, affectionate disposition, which endeared her to all, saved her from being a mere spoiled pet. Much admired and courted in society, she had selected as her most favored suitor, much to the surprise of her gay friends, Louis St. Clair, a young man of gentlemanly appearance and address, but whose quiet, reserved manner served to contrast strongly with her gayety and animation. He was one of those sterling characters so worthy of respect and admiration, yet so rarely appreciated, whom we might oftener meet, did we but pause to inquire beyond the mere surface. As in gazing in the sunlight upon the night-blooming flower, we perceive no trace of the fragrance and beauty lavished upon the evening's zephyrs, nor detect that the plant possesses more than beauty of growth and form, so in life is many a noble soul unknown and unheeded, because it could not ostentatiously display its priceless worth. Ellen Montrose, however, was not insensible to his quiet merit, and all of her heart's young love was lavished upon him, who fully prized and returned it.

His business was, as Heloise had described it, a lucrative one; and, possessing the power of surrounding himself with comforts, and even luxuries, he hoped, in sharing his home with Ellen, to realize all of happiness that his wildest dreams had pictured. Thus entering life upon a pathway literally strewn with flowers, why should Ellen Montrose have those fears she named to her sister? Because few girls so young—for she was scarce eighteen—can realize the practical duties of life until brought directly in contact with them. Can a young girl, to whom love is one bright, romantic dream, and marriage but the assurance of its reality, imagine that a wish of her own would ever be at variance with the desire of the loved one? or that he, to whom she is now so dear, would ever pause to question her will, however arbitrary? No; few look beyond the present sunny hour; and it was because, in the depth and fervency of her love, Ellen would encompass her whole existence and make it all his, that she felt and feared so much. Let us follow these young hearts as they proceed onward in life, and mark the influence of worldly care upon their now undivided feelings.

We will not attempt a description of the splendor, brilliancy, and joyousness of the gay fête which attended the celebration of their nuptials, or of the beautiful bride who, radiant as a bright star, surrounded by her scarce less beautiful satellites, was led by Louis St. Clair to the altar, and there, with willing heart and in firm tone, pronounced the vow that made her his forever; nor can we follow them through their wild career of pleasure, as they are seen, again and again, the gayest amid the gay of those admiring friends who sought and courted them.

Two years have passed ere we revert to them. During the early period of her married life, Ellen, now Mrs. St. Clair, was the gayest of the gay; but now she sought less frequently the crowded saloon, and busy friends conjectured that either Ellen St. Clair was not happy, or her husband and self were as selfishly indifferent to friendships as most young married people usually become; even Heloise was perplexed, for even to her Ellen was changed, but still affectionate, and she could not ask her why it was.

Could she have preceded Louis, as each day he sought his home, and seen Ellen, as she heard his footstep, rise, unable for an instant to check the impulse impelling her to meet him before he reached the apartment she occupied, then, with an effort at self-command, quietly reseated herself, and wait to salute him with a smile only as he entered, she might have guessed the truth; but, shrinking from intrusion upon the private feelings of her dearly loved sister, she sought not very frequently to visit her, hoping that Ellen's first lessons in the book of life would not eventually determine in unhappiness.

And Louis, was he changed? Ay. He, whose ardent nature seemed to demand a continual expression, by manner, of affection, would seem satisfied with this cold greeting, and, book in hand, we find him hour after hour deeply engaged. A close observer might frequently detect an anxious, earnest glance bestowed upon Ellen, as she busied herself, or changed her occupation; but she saw it not, and many a smothered sigh nearly escaped her lips as she felt his neglect, and found him, if she stole a glance at him, apparently absorbed with the book he held.

This mode of life was not suddenly brought about; it had been by slow degrees; nor was there wanting altogether between them kindness of manner. But where was the glad welcome, and the constant, cheerful attention to each other which characterized their early married days? Gone; ay, gone. And so gradually had this change been wrought, that neither seemed to be aware of it, and yet both suffered deeply. Often had Ellen resolved to break the spell; but, as he too was silent, she strove to subdue her wishes for more certain proofs of affection than this quiet kindness afforded, and tried to teach herself it was not reasonable to expect all the devoted attention of former days. It was a hard task to school that young heart, with its warm impulses and ardent love; and many, and often times, as he bade her good morning, and, with only a smile, left her alone, she sought the solitude of her own chamber, and wept long and bitterly that so soon Louis had learned to love her less. Nor was this all; for, added to this, frequently had it happened that her earnestly expressed wish to obtain or accomplish an object met no approval, and was apparently unheeded by him. These little trials, unexpected as they were, had aided to estrange them still more; and, as Ellen had often seen his brow clouded for some time after such occurrences, she learned to think she had angered him, and in silence bore the pain such a supposition inflicted.

Time thus wore on; but, of late, Ellen's heart throbbed still more violently at his entrance, as she observed a pallor of countenance unusual to him, and a restlessness of manner which spoke to her fears of bodily ailment, and consequently alarmed her. To her kind inquiries, he assured her of his perfect health; and, not daring to urge an explanation of the cause, though certain a cause existed, her health suffered with the oppression of her accumulated anxieties.

"I must leave you on the morrow, Ellen," said Louis St. Clair, abruptly, to her one evening, "and may not return for some time. Perhaps," he added, as he saw her cheeks lose their color while he spoke, "one of your sister's children will remain with you while I am gone, as you may be lonely."

For a moment, every pulsation of her heart ceased, as each word had been so calmly uttered it had smote her heavily; then rising, and struggling to hide her emotion, she sought to leave the room; but her trembling limbs refused their support, and, sinking exhausted upon the nearest seat, tears uncontrollable gushed from the fountains of her overcharged heart.

Surprised and terrified at the exhibition of a grief so overwhelming, Louis in a moment clasped her to his heart, and begged, with endearing earnestness, to know its cause.

"Let me weep, Louis, or my heart will break," she said, after a few moments. "It is not exactly that you are to leave me now I grieve; but," she added, impetuously, "I cannot longer live as we have lived lately. You, whom I love as my own existence, can leave me without one caress, to pass the long, lonely hours, and count the moments until you return; and then, when my heart bounds with joy to meet you, I receive but a chill salutation, sometimes scarce a look of recognition; and then you calmly occupy yourself with pursuits in which I can have no share. It is this, Louis, that saddens me, and is wearing away not only my health, but every wish that one so young would naturally have for life; for, without your love, life is not desirable; and I have only now to beg that, if you really love me not, you will in mercy hide the fearful truth."

"Ellen, Ellen, I pray you be calm," he interrupted. "I cannot let you speak thus. I had not dreamed of this, and have much to speak of; for I, too, am not happy. I have doubted you."

"Doubted my love, Louis? No, no, it could not be! You, for whom I have renounced every one, even my own dear sister, kind as she ever is, as I could not bear she should know my grief, else she might have blamed you. No, no, Louis, you could not doubt me!"

"Yes, Ellen, I have. It is a long, long time since I first missed the light footsteps that hastened to meet me whenever I came, and many months have passed since I received a joyous welcome to this, our once happy home, and have wondered why it was, as I knew no cause. During the past year, I have known many new cares, and have sought my home with oppressed heart, where, had my Ellen loved me as I once fondly believed, I could not have long pondered in silence; but, met with reserve and coldness by one whose impulsive nature I thought could not be controlled, I have been forced to believe the heart was changed, and there was a bitterness in the thought that at times almost unmanned me. I struggled long, Ellen, against the fearful belief; but it would haunt me, and my manner must have betrayed it. But now!"

"Now," she interrupted, joyfully, "I have been mistaken, and you love me still! Oh, Louis, I would purchase the joy this assurance gives with all the pain of the past, for we never can mistake each other again; and oh, it is bitter to think that one to whom we are bound by all the ties that make life dear, would even in thought desert us! I know my follies have often justly angered you; but!"

"Angry with you, I never was. I know why you think so; and, to convince you, I will tell you now what I thought you should never know, as I would have spared you the anxiety it would necessarily cause. It was not long after our marriage, when I discovered inaccuracies in my accounts which puzzled and alarmed me; with difficulty, I discovered their author. I regret to even tell you how treacherously my partner abused my trust in him; and, when led on by the influence of his giddy young wife, you proposed first one then another expensive pleasure, which, in my embarrassment, I well knew I could not afford, I thought, by evasion and apparent forgetfulness, to cause you to relinquish them, without giving you the pain of a positive refusal, or this explanation, now due to you, as well as myself."

"And then it was all in very love for me, instead of anger! Oh, Louis, can you ever forgive me for trifling so wilfully with your happiness and my own? To think that I could not see you had enough of care without my annoying childishness, and that, in your most trying hour, I should have deserted you! I cannot forgive myself. I am not worthy of you."

"You must not reproach yourself alone, Ellen, for I should have seen that you waited for proofs of affection from me; but I was too selfishly absorbed with my own cares, and the fault is equally mine."

"No, no, Louis, the fault is mine alone; and I can only say, in extenuation of it, that I forgot there should be no pride between husband and wife, and, wearied with waiting in vain for your proffered caress, I determined, after a long time, to bestow none myself unasked."

"And, my dear Ellen, being so long accustomed to receive gladly all you bestowed, I only realized how dear they were when altogether deprived of them. Let it be a lesson for the future, Ellen; for, with husband and wife, there should be neither false pride nor want of confidence. Our happiness has trembled fearfully; and now!"

"Now, Louis, were it not for your pale cheek and careworn look, I could be happy. But why do you let this trouble in business annoy you so much? You know we could easily live upon less, if it must be, and you should not hesitate at any step, however severe, if necessary."

"This is why I go to-morrow, Ellen. The events of the next week are to decide whether my name, which I have tried to bear through life untarnished, will stand or not; and, if it does not, my Ellen, it will require all your love to receive again"—he paused in agitation, as the horrid supposition of a blemished reputation presented itself.

"Hush, hush, Louis!" she exclaimed; "do not let even these walls hear you utter a thought so unjust to yourself. You must hope, Louis; and, hoping, and fearing not, you will surely succeed. It cannot be that errors detected so quickly can produce such fearful consequences. Only be calm, and let not that horrid supposition ever present itself again; for Louis St. Clair will never be less esteemed among men than now."

"Bless you, my noble wife!" he exclaimed, as he pressed her to his heart; "for this assurance, even from you, gives me hope. And, as the cloud which so long hovered o'er our domestic peace has at length passed on and left us unharmed, so may it cease to o'ershadow the name which, for your sake more than my own, I would proudly bear!"

That the assurances of his wife were fully realized, we must believe, when we see them as now, after the lapse of many years, surrounded by all that wealth can give, happy in each other's love, and the now maternally, but still beautiful Ellen, the happy mother of children beautiful and interesting as the group we first presented her among.

HOME EXERCISES.

We present our readers with two more of the series of calisthenics, which, we are happy to say, have attracted considerable attention. We have no doubt of the benefit to be derived from the adoption of these exercises, particularly by invalids: because they are so completely under the control of the persons using them, that they are in no danger of fatiguing or exhausting themselves in their use. The unhappy consequences of the neglect of a great portion of our female population to avail themselves of early exercises are too apparent, as well on the public streets, and in our public assemblies, as in the private sick-rooms and in the public asylums. No effort, therefore, which gives the least promise of mitigating the sufferings of those who have too long neglected their health, and certainly no effort which promises to establish the necessity of an early habit, of all others the most likely to prolong a healthy existence, should be treated with indifference. We shall conclude this series in our December number, when we hope to be able to present some views more interesting to our readers than those which have preceded.

PRIDE OF BIRTH.

A TALE OF CHRISTMAS TIME.

BY ALICE B. NEAL.

"From yon blue heavens above us bent,
The gardener Adam and his wife
Smile at the claims of long descent
Howe'er it be, it seems to me
'Tis only noble to be good.
Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood."

THEYNTON.

"YOUR pupils are not in the house, I believe," said Colonel Haywood, courteously. "I have sent Maumer Fanny to look for them; she knows all their haunts. I am speaking of the children, however, now; Edward is in town with John. You will find them very wild, I have no doubt, since their—since they have been left to their maumer's care."

Colonel Haywood had not yet learned to speak of his wife's death before strangers. His face flushed slightly even now, and Philip Anson, the new tutor, noticed it, but seemed absorbed in watching the beautiful landscape. It was all so new to his Northern eyes; the broad, uninclosed fields, with their foam-like waves of snowy cotton; the gnarled, spreading oaks, heavy with the hoary moss, that swayed lightly to and fro in the rising evening wind; the delicious softness of a Southern sunset sky, to which he was not yet accustomed.

They were standing in the porch, or piazza, at which Philip had dismounted; and, looking down the avenue, a merry equestrian party came in sight. Two lads, in linen blouses and broad straw hats, mounted on the same patient steed; while, galloping backwards and forwards, now wheeling around them, now dashing far ahead, on a pony as wild as herself, May Haywood, the colonel's only daughter, mingled her boisterous shouts of laughter with theirs.

Philip could but admire the grace of the child's movements, and the fearless ease with which she managed her pony; but he thought her a sad mad-cap, nevertheless, and wondered what his demure little sister, who was doubtless knitting her stocking at that very moment, would have said to this hoydenish gallop. She threw herself from the saddle as she saw her father upon the porch, and came up with a half shy, half assured manner, to be introduced to her new teacher.

"Mr. Anson, May," said her father, gravely, for he was struck more forcibly than ever with her need of care and restraint. It may be that he saw with Philip's eyes just then.

VOL. XLV.—39

She gave her hand to him frankly, and looked up into his face with a bright, winning smile—

"You won't make me study Latin, will you?" she said. "George says you will, and he hates Latin I'm sure I shall, if it's hard. I hate to study."

"Do you?" said the young tutor, amused and interested. With all her fearlessness, there was something very feminine in the light of her large gray eyes, and the smile of her finely curved mouth. There was an air of inborn pride and resolution in it, too, and, in the haughty arch of the white throat, an air rarely noticeable in a child. The delicately pencilled eyebrows, the long, dark lashes, the small carved ear, all contributed to this, and her hair was drawn entirely back from her forehead, after the fashion of our grandmothers. For the rest, her dress was plain in the material, and carelessly put on. She had one of her brother's broad straw hats in her hand, hanging by its black ribbon, and a cape of common chintz only protected her neck and arms. But the picture suited the landscape; and Philip Anson, with an artist's eye, admired it, without one thought of the beautiful human soul that was awaiting his development.

It was a solitary life to one accustomed to the stir and hum of a Northern city, or the dear companionship of college friends. The same unvaried routine, little company or change to interrupt their morning's studies, the afternoon ride or ramble. Colonel Haywood was much away from home, the children left in his absence to the care of his innumerable household, in which Maumer Fanny held the place of authority. When there, he was always courteous, though somewhat reserved; thanked Philip for the improvement, both in mind and manner, of his pupils, and often conversed with him in the library, which, though small, was well chosen, on matters of general history and political interest. When he was away, Philip was left with no other companionship but his own thoughts, his books, and the children. The overseer was an intelligent, but entirely uneducated man, busy on the plantation from early morning until late at night. The picturesque traits of negro character were a matter of amusement at first, and, of course, after a little time, had made their services natural, and even necessary to him, so all subjects of real interest were confined to a very narrow circle.

Edward and John were his two eldest pupils. The children, as the three youngest were called, were not strictly his charge; but he had assumed the care of their training at his own request. The boys, as yet, showed little interest in study, but May became a wonder even to her instructor. Her mother had been an orphan of a proud old family, who had died away one by one, until she had scarcely a near relative left. Colonel Haywood's family were in a distant part of the State, people of precise and formal fashion in the circles of the city, which they rarely left except to go North for the summer, or, attended by a train of servants, to the up-country springs for a month or two. Colonel Haywood had offended them by marrying out of the family circle of connection, though, fortunately, nothing could be said against the birth of the lady. Her family was as ancient as their own, both tracing back to colonial governors, and beyond them into the partial obscurity of early English annals. There was a gray stone monument, in the magnolia walk, to this official ancestor, flanked on either side by a graceful cypress-tree. May, with a sad look of veneration, always declared that it spoiled her favorite flower-bed, and she wanted some popinack-trees exactly where the cypress grew. But the boys already regarded the political and social virtues of "Governor John Haywood," as set forth on this brown-stone tablet, as a part of their ancestral inheritance.

But it was for these reasons that May had known so little of feminine influence and example beyond Maumer Fanny's indulgent teachings. She could neither sew nor write a respectable hand. She had read or looked through half the books in her father's library, that contained any inklings of romance or legendary lore, and she could manage her pony with the graceful fearlessness of an Indian maiden, rather than the easy self-possession of an accomplished horsewoman. These were her only accomplishments; but she had health and vigor from this wild, lawless life, and an unpruned luxuriance of imagination and quick sensibility.

At first, she was disposed to rebel against anything like restraint; but Philip held the reins lightly, and she sometimes even did not recognize a guiding hand. Now the thirst for knowledge opened a deep, unfathomed well within her heart, of sympathy for all that was noble and true in life, and a wild ambition that belonged to the slumbering elements of her character. They were much together; for John and Edward were disposed to consider him only as their tutor, to be respected and obeyed, but not taken into their boyish confidences. George and Hamilton were children merely. Even May felt that they were no longer her equals. In their morning lessons—for she no longer discarded the Latin her brothers industriously pursued, but listened eagerly to all that Philip said—in their long rambles by the silent shores of the broad river, or in the dim twilight of the thick woods, she was his constant, cheerful companion. He opened his very heart to his child friend, for he was still young, and needed sympathy, and told her of his Northern home, and why he was obliged to abandon his profession because they were very poor, his mother and sisters, and he was working now for them, but still in the hope of some day completing his studies and taking a useful position. He described his mother—for May asked a thousand questions—a pale, quiet woman, who had suffered much, and who loved him tenderly; and his sisters, Mary, but two years younger than himself, who wrote him such long and affectionate letters, and Annie, just May's own age, but far beyond her in all womanly ways.

"Just show me how to hem; come, Lorry," May had said to her seamstress, the day after she found Annie Anson could make sheets, and even helped on her brother's clothes.

The girl did not like to be interrupted in her laborious occupation, sitting on the floor and stringing beads for a necklace.

"Go long wid ye now, Miss May, don't ye see I 'ee been bein' berry busy. Whar for ye want to sew? 'Spec you make de nice work, any how."

"Come now, Lorry, and I'll try to learn as quick as possible; and I won't tear my dress again on the gin, or take my apron strings to piece out my reins. Just show me a little."

So the good-tempered, but indolent maid gave the first lesson in her seamstress art, and May improved wonderfully upon them, and could soon set very neat stitches quite alone. Her first practice of this new womanly accomplishment was hemming a set of handkerchiefs, which she had coaxed out of Maumer Fanny's store-room, for Mr. Anson; and these she left in his room, with a note, expressed simply enough, but in an awkward and most unscholarly hand, begging his acceptance of them as her work. And then she waited with nervous impatience until he had found them, and blushed with pleasure at his expressions of surprise and commendation, more delighted than when he praised the construction of a difficult problem, or the translation of her first ten lines of Virgil.

The four years that seemed so long to look forward to passed rapidly away. College duties summoned John and Edward from home, and a governess took the place of a tutor in Colonel Haywood's domestic arrangements. Philip parted with regret from his now manly pupils, who acknowledged that they owed much besides mere school instruction to him, and from May, as he had left his sister Mary, for there was the same similarity of taste and pursuits; though at fifteen there was much still wanting to make up a perfect womanly character in the enthusiastic, impulsive girl. Colonel Haywood, ever kind and generous, was not wanting in good wishes, and Philip returned to his home feeling that he had not wasted the years of his seclusion.

This was the retrospect that occupied his heart and mind, on his approach, after long absence, to these familiar scenes. The long reach of lovely woodland ride was filled with pleasant recollections of the time when he first came there, a stranger, now a welcomed and invited friend. Here was the white, wooden bridge, with its rustic paling, where their horses always stopped to drink, and May, in an unguarded moment, had found herself uncomfortably immersed in the glancing waters, Frisk, meanwhile, leisurely surveying her through his shaggy mane. The woods were perfumed with the long wreaths of golden jasmine as then, the bright emerald leaves of the wild grape-vines circling among the fragrant blossoms. Cherokee roses bloomed in white and creamy beauty in the hedge-rows, and even the gray moss seemed only a neutral tint necessary in all this gush of brightness to temper the landscape. Philip drew off his travelling-cap, and bared his brow to the soft, delicious air. He rode joyously onward, longing to see them all once more, every familiar object sending a thrill of pleasure to his heart.

Now the well-remembered avenue came in sight, the giant oaks, their fantastic shapes throwing a mass of shadow on the turf beneath them, the moss sweeping down, and making a cool, gray tent, suggestive of twilight reverie or the morning's idle reading. Here, often he had seen Frisk trained to the wide circle of shadow thrown by these densely woven branches, and he glanced up involuntarily, as if expecting to see his little mistress and her gay steed coming down to meet him. But the "boy" who had been appropriated to his especial service was the only creature in sight; and, now that Philip was discovered, York moved towards him with an alacrity entirely foreign to his nature.

"Bress my soul, massa! so you done cum at las!" was the first greeting, as the good-natured face shone a welcome with all its wealth of ivory. "Knowed ye jus' dis minute, 'cause you ain't been grow ole. I perticipated 'twas you w'en I see de hors'; an' Miss May, she send de lub, an' hope you berry well."

"Miss May! Are not the family at home?"

"Massa, ole massa gone to de club, Massa John an' he; Massa Edward gone for de fine canter wid Miss Carline an' Miss Lizbeth. Miss May hab de misery in de head—'spec it am—anyhow, she ax to stay in de library an' read. She hab de great 'pacity, massa say."

Philip remembered York's delight in large words of old. It was his habit to linger about the room at lessons, and astonish his fellow-servants with the phrases and terms he contrived to remember.

So May was at home, perhaps expecting him; but who were Miss "Carline and Miss 'Liz'beth?"

There was some little change in the external appearance of the mansion; no alterations—that would have been sacrilege in the eyes of Colonel Haywood, but an air of renovation and general neatness foreign to it of old.

He saw her first in the hall, dusky with afternoon shadows, for she had seen him dismount, and came out to meet him. The clear, silvery tones of the voice were the same, the light of the eyes unaltered, but the child was a tall, stately woman, who received her father's guest with finished ease, as if she had been long accustomed to do the honors of the mansion.

"My father left his compliments for you, Mr. Anson," she said, as they entered the library together, "as I bade York tell you, and will be home soon. My brothers are just returned from the North, and will be glad to welcome you again. I scarcely knew them, they had improved so much. I hope Hamilton and George will do equal credit to you. We are all happy to have you with us once more. It seems like old times to see you in the 'accustomed place.'"

But Philip did not think so. Then, when he closed his book in sad or pleasant thought, the child May would come stealing to his side, with a caressing hand upon his shoulder, and those large, eager eyes raised with inquiry. Now the beautiful woman, beautiful most of all by her nobility of manner, sat there so calm, so stately, and, he thought, so cold. The formal inquiries for his journey, his health, the news from the North, it was not what he had expected; and his heart, that had leaped up so joyously, sank down as though some leaden weight were pressing on it. The very air seemed heavy, and he was glad, for the first time in their intercourse, to hear the tramp of horses announce the return of the equestrians, and the conclusion of their tête-à-tête.

Edward was, indeed, vastly improved, a frank, gentlemanly man, who greeted him heartily; but Miss Caroline, the aunt, who now resided with them, and Miss Elizabeth Hamilton, a cousin, were content to return his salutation by a cold bow, as they swept across the room, their habits trailing after them like the train of a royal robe. They evidently wished to impress upon the new-comer a sense of their own unapproachable dignity, and of his proper place as tutor, in the household. Colonel Haywood's return was the first thing to break the uncomfortable spell. There was a real heartiness in his greeting, and the thanks he had to offer for Philip's compliance with his request that he would return to take charge of his younger children, with the assurances of a generous remuneration, and a welcome from all to his old home. John's manner was more restrained, but not the less gentlemanly; and, when Philip had visited Maumer Fanny in her own quarter, and received the present of two new-laid eggs—a most embarrassing gift, he could but acknowledge—in return for the bandanas he had brought her, he began to think that Haywood might seem like home to him, after all.

In his old room again, with the well-remembered landscape flooded by the tranquil moonlight, the thought of May's greeting returned. But, after all, was it not right and natural? What else could he have expected from the change in years and position?

The summer, with its change of residence, was passed. Strange that death should lurk in the wreathings of those graceful parasites, or be hidden in the splendor of those brave old woods! Haywood was deserted with the first tranquil summer day, and the first autumn night duly recalled the scattered family group. Philip and his young pupils did not accompany the Northern party; and the boys, who had not ceased to talk of "sister May's" excellences, were delighted at the prospect of welcoming her home again. In his secret heart, Philip had looked for a renewal of something like the old intercourse; but the dignified Miss Caroline was ever at hand, and in the evening, or at their meals, once so social, she took pains to direct the conversation so that he had little part in it: to their relatives, whom Philip had never seen, people they had met in their late tour, the neighbors who had once more called at Haywood, now that May had entered society, and was known to be heiress, in her own right, to a large and unexpectedly productive property, Mrs. Haywood's dower.

To be sure, Colonel Haywood's manner placed him on a social equality in all their visits and visitings. He was always invited with them, though rarely accepting, and the boys were taught unhesitating obedience to his commands. But what availed all this, while John's haughtiness, and Miss Caroline's pomp, even May's reserve,

"Still suggested clear between them
The pale spectrum of the salt!"

Philip tried to struggle with this cold, unmanly feeling, but in vain. Colonel Haywood's kindness only marked all he shrank from more plainly, and Edward's good-natured frankness failed to win him. The boys became his companions more and more, or, mounting his horse, he would be absent for hours, now riding at a mad gallop through the silent forests, or, with reins laid upon the neck of the faithful steed, he wandered absorbed in thought, and only feeling the cool October air playing upon his forehead. And this was the end of all his bright anticipations of a return to his old home! It was for this he had given up the cheerful society of his own dear family; the gentle mother, so tenderly alive to every cloud that drifted across his path; Mary, now happily married, and the gay pranks of his little nephew, named for him, and who made them wonder how they had ever lived without the mischievous merry-maker; Annie, who had taken her sister's place as correspondent, adviser, and comforter! This moody, restless spirit was foreign to his nature.

Day by day, the loveliness and harmony of May's character grew upon him. So deferential to her father and aunt, the latter often a trial both to temper and spirits, the life of the household, and of the neighborhood, yet still finding time to go on in the difficult paths of study he had assisted to mark out for her, and accomplished in the graces "which most adorn a woman."

How often he sat in the twilight in the little nook that had been her favorite reading-place when a child, shut by a fall of drapery from the principal drawing-room, and, with his face covered by his hands, listened to the thrilling music of voice and instrument which she poured forth, unaware that any listener shared in the enjoyment which music and its cultivation had long given to her. Miss Caroline invariably went to sleep in her lounging-chair, or on a sofa, after dinner; the colonel sometimes walked up and down the room in the firelight, often busy with mournful thought, for the voice was so like her mother's. Philip, not daring to intrude, listened in half sad, half hopeful reverie, sometimes melted almost to tears, and again roused to all that was noble and brave by the changing strain.

He watched her from the dusky recess, as she sat absorbed in her own harmonies, the grace of the drooping figure, the clear, luminous eyes, half revealed. Then she would suddenly quit the keys, and lean over the instrument, as if absorbed in dreams of her own creation, or pacing, with much of her father's manner, through the room, the firelight glancing upon her dress, or the softly banded hair, or the white and rounded arm. And sometimes she sighed, a long, quivering sigh, like a child that has exhausted emotion in tears.

It was a beautiful, but dangerous study. He longed to read her heart as of old, the aims hidden beneath her usual calm exterior, the memory or the fear echoed in those quivering sighs. Yet he knew this was a confidence he had no right to ask. But why? Had she not always been to him as a sister?

She came to him one day, as he sat reading alone in the library. It was dull and rainy, one of those days when visiting or outdoor exercise is impossible, and the home circle gather more closely. A day of days to those who indulge in the luxury of a new volume, or closer study of ancient lore. No intruders from the social world; no idle, distracting gossip; no wooing sunshine falling upon the open page. Only the obscured, but not melancholy light; the music of the slowly pattering rain upon the window-ledge, or the branches of the leafless trees; the cheerful humming of the fire upon the hearth, inviting to its gentle companionship. Such a day was dreadful to Miss Caroline. No visitors, no rides, no anything, but that eternal and tiresome knitting! May had this morning thoughtfully provided her with a new open-work stitch, and had seen her comfortably engrossed with its mysteries.

The boys had finished their tasks, the gentlemen had ridden over to a parish meeting, and May had dedicated the quiet thus insured to a long review of a favorite author. She started to find the library already occupied, and turned, as if to leave it. Then came back, as Philip bowed and rose to leave her in possession, with something of her old manner the reserve melting into one of her most open and winning smiles. He could but think of the expression, half coaxing, half assured, with which she had been wont to prefer her childish requests.

"If you will not think me too troublesome," she said, laying her hand on the volume she had come in search of.

"Troublesome, Miss Haywood!" he echoed. "Ah, no, you never were troublesome, even in your most mischievous moods."

It was the first time he had ever alluded to their old position of teacher and pupil; but she was so like the child May just then.

"Never? You forget how you used to scold me, or look at me, I mean—it was always worse than Maumer Fanny's scolding—for my sad, romping ways, the torn frocks and aprons, the dog-eared books; and I'm sure you must remember how I teased my brothers when they were trying to study, and mocked the 'his hæc hoo' Edward used to stumble in. I must have been a household torment," she added, still smiling.

Philip's reserve and moodiness for the moment melted at the remembrance of her mischievous gaiety; its spirit, still lurking in that smile, exorcised all the bitterness of months.

"You were going to read?" he said.

"A little. I find I am getting sadly behind. Truth is, I get little time, and I meet with many difficulties which I have not patience to conquer. I sometimes have been tempted"—

"Not to give up your studies, I hope?" Philip spoke eagerly. He had often mentally attributed much of the superiority of her character to this patient and well-directed industry.

"No—yes, sometimes. But that was not what I meant just then. I was going to say—to beg you to take another pupil, or an old one in charge again; but I have never had the courage to ask it."

"Ah, have you? Will you allow me to offer any assistance, any advice? I have so much idle leisure; and it would carry me back to those dear old days: not that I could ever fancy you a child again."

So the agreement was made, and once more Philip directed that quick, grasping intellect, and learned to wonder daily at its strength, and yet the true womanliness of its character, that could turn from deep philosophy to the details of social life.

There was a new charm for his existence. He ceased to notice John's hauteur, or be annoyed by Miss Caroline's marked dislike; nay, he even offered to assist her in sorting worsteds one evening, when the dim twilight mingled and confused colors beyond her somewhat failing vision. Not that Miss Caroline ever paid any outward tribute to Time. Far from it. Her dress was quite as juvenile as May's, and her double eye-glass was assumed, as she on this occasion assured Philip, only on account of a most annoying near-sightedness.

Even York noticed the change in his mood, and told Lorry, now Miss May's own maid, "he 'spected Massa Philip hab great fortune lef' him, hab such fine spirits, and whistle w'en he cum in. Else de lady lub, orf to de Norf—hab de 'garotype on de table, wid de elegant curls—gwine to hab him right away. Guess she hab a heap o' money herself." A piece of speculation which Lorry took care to communicate to her mistress that very evening, with her own remarks and additions.

(To be concluded.)

ILLUSTRIOUS WOMEN OF OUR TIME.

"It seems to me that we over-educate the memory, while the temper and the feelings are neglected: forgetting that the future will be governed much more by the affections than by the understanding."—L. E. L.

MRS. ELLIS.

It has been judiciously remarked that "if the possession of excellent talents is not a conclusive reason why they should be improved, it at least amounts to a very strong presumption; and if it can be shown that women may be trained to reason and imagine as well as men, the strongest reasons are certainly necessary to show us why we should not avail ourselves of such rich gifts of nature; and we have a right to call for a clear statement of those perils which make it necessary that such talents should be totally extinguished, or at most, very partially drawn out. Nature makes to us rich and magnificent presents, and we say to her, 'You are too luxuriant and munificent, we must keep you under, and prune you. We have talents enough in the other half of the creation, and if you will not stupefy and enfeeble the mind of women to our hands, we ourselves must expose them to a narcotic process, and educate away that fatal redundancy with which the world is afflicted, and the order of sublunary things deranged.'"

Thus wrote one of the leading spirits of the age in the year 1810. At the present day he would not have to lament that the finest faculties in the world have been confined to trifles utterly unworthy of their richness and their strength: for the pursuit of knowledge has become the most interesting as it is the most innocent occupations of the female sex;

they have learned to feel that happiness is to be derived from the acquisition of knowledge as well as from the gratification of vanity. While this most important change has been thus progressing, we have solid reasons for judging that the important duties of life have not been neglected, for at Home woman still reigns, and

As mother, daughter, wife,
Strews with fresh flowers the narrow way of life, quite as efficiently and satisfactorily as when her time was wholly devoted to the household gods. That "good mothers make good men," may still be aptly quoted in application to our fair countrywomen; and the "Mothers of England," by Mrs. Ellis, one of a series of works on the subject of female duty, is a fair exemplification of the manner in which it frequently is, and we trust ever will continue to be carried out.

In the choice of her subjects, Mrs. Ellis has been duly actuated by a feeling of their importance as regards the condition and happiness of women, and consequently has sometimes given offence by reprobating too sharply the follies which are sanctioned by society, and the peculiarity in the present aspect of social and domestic life which commonly are expected to pass unobserved. On this subject she remarks: "If, in the performance of this stern duty, I may at times have appeared unjust, or unsisterly, to the class of readers whose attention I have been anxious to engage, they will surely have been able to perceive that it was from no want of sympathy with the weakness, the trials, the temptations to which woman is peculiarly liable; but rather, since we can least bear a fault in that which we most admire, from an extreme solicitude that woman should fill, with advantage to others and enjoyment to herself, that high place in the creation for which I believe her character was designed." We have many valuable dissertations upon female character as exhibited upon the broad scale of virtue, but, until this excellent series of Mrs. Ellis's, none which contained a direct definition of those minor parts of domestic and social intercourse which strengthen into habit, and consequently form the basis of moral character. She has penetrated into the familiar scenes of domestic life, and has thus endeavored to lay bare some of the causes which frequently lie hidden at the root of general conduct. "I have confined my attention," she remarks, "to the cultivation of habit—to the minor morals of domestic life, because there are so many abler pens than mine employed in teaching and enforcing the essential truths of religion, and there is an evident tendency in society to overlook these minor points, while it is impossible for them to be neglected without serious injury to the Christian character."

The whole aim, in short, of Mrs. Ellis, in her benevolent and moral exhortations to woman, is to encourage her in becoming what Wordsworth has so happily described—

"A perfect being, nobly planned,
To warn, to counsel, and command;
And yet a spirit still, and bright
With something of an angel's light."

But while we entirely concur with Mrs. Ellis in deprecating the over-education and the laborious exercises to which youthful minds are sometimes subjected, and which too frequently overcloud the spring-time of life, we cannot exactly sympathize with her in the disposition, from which she is not free, to deprecate accomplishments, as if there was anything at variance between them and pursuits of a more intellectual nature; and she sometimes, too, seems to forget that a woman is no longer bound apprentice to accomplishments only; that her understanding is not now confined "to hang upon walls or vibrate on strings," but has become the first spring and ornament of society, for it is enriched with attainments upon which alone such power and influence depend. And in saying this, we do not depreciate the accomplishments which lend so many charms to social intercourse; so far from it, we wish to convey the fact that practical good sense, with science and accomplishments, are thoroughly compatible.

It was in 1833 that Miss Sarah Stickney (the maiden name of Mrs. Ellis) first appeared before the public in a literary career in which she has been so eminently successful, and her three series of "Pictures of Private Life" soon became as popular as they have ever since continued to be. Her mode of combining pure lessons of morality and manners with the amusement and interest of fictional narrative has been successfully followed up by, among others, "Family Secrets, or How to Make Home Happy," and "Social Distinctions, or Hearts and Homes." A residence of fifteen months on the Continent has enabled us to profit by a very amusing and well-written little book, entitled "Summer and Winter in the Pyrenees," and the sensible remarks on travelling with which it concludes cannot too strongly be impressed on all those seekers of excitement who think that change of place and scene will infallibly stimulate listlessness or remove discontent. In her own case she completely verified the truth of her motto: "I know of no pleasure that will compare with going abroad, excepting one—returning home."

In 1845, Mrs. Ellis brought out the "Young Ladies' Reader." The remarks which it contains on the art of reading well are sound, judicious, and usefully directed, and entirely do we agree with her opinion that reading aloud ought to form a part of an accomplished education, particularly in regard to females. "If in our ideas of the fine arts," remarks the authoress, "we include all those embellishments of civilized life which combine in a high degree the trifications of a refined taste with the exercise of an enlightened intellect, then must reading aloud hold a prominent place amongst those arts which impart a charm to social intercourse at the same time that they elevate and purify the associations of ordinary life. The art of reading aloud and reading well is thus entitled to our serious consideration, inasmuch as it may be made a highly influential means of imparting a zest and an interest to domestic associations; and of investing with the charm of perpetual freshness the conversation of the family circle, the intercourse of friendship, and the communion of "mutual minds." One of the highest offices of thought, when communicated by one individual, is to strike out thoughts from others. There are books which operate in this manner to such an extent as almost to create a new era in the intellectual existence of the reader; and where this is the case, how vastly superior is the enjoyment always arising out of new trains and fresh combinations of ideas, when shared with others, than when only confined to ourselves! Books are often our best friends, and therefore we ought to share them together." The remarks on the art of reading well we beg most pointedly to recommend to our fair readers, assured that they must benefit by a study of the advice there conveyed, while we are equally assured that they will be amused as well as instructed by the succeeding selection of extracts, which is modern, and made with much taste and care; at the same time the pieces are not of such length as to infringe on the copyrights of the authors, but are rather brief specimens of their style and mode of thought.

COSTUMES OF ALL NATIONS.—THIRD SERIES.

CHAPTER XII.

THE TOILET IN IRELAND.

THE ancient dress of the Irish appears to be but little known till the twelfth century, when it is said to have been much the same as that worn by the southern Britons. After the garments of skins were discarded, the Irish adopted breeches, a cota, and a mantle, fastened, as usual, with a brooch or bodkin. Armillæ and torques were favorite ornaments among them. Giraldus Cambriensis says of the Irish in the twelfth century: "They wear their woollen clothes mostly black, because the sheep in Ireland are in general of that color; the dress itself is of a barbarous fashion. They wear moderate close-hooded or cowed mantles, which spread over their shoulders and reach down to the elbow, composed of small pieces of cloth, of different kinds and colors, for the most part sewed together; beneath which they have woollen phalinges, instead of a cloak, or breeches and stockings in one piece, and these generally dyed of some color."

The mantle and brogues are two well known parts of an Irish costume. Froissart, in Richard the Second's reign, mentions the four Irish kings who swore allegiance to that monarch, and says that linen drawers were ordered to be made for them, and houpelands of silk, trimmed with miniver and gris. "For," adds the chronicler, "formerly these Irish kings were thought to be well dressed if wrapped up in an Irish mantle." The dress of the females up to this time is but little known; but it is supposed that they wore mantles, bodkins in their hair, and various ornaments of jewels; they are said to have been very partial to long hair, and allowed it to grow lank and rough, and to fall over their ears.

Fine cloth, silks, and cloth of gold, it is said, were worn by the higher ranks in the sixteenth century, and worsted and canvas materials by the lower orders. In the reign of Henry the Eighth, an act was passed to prevent the Irish wearing clothes dyed of their favorite color, saffron; the number of yards also allowed for their garments is specified, and women are ordered not to wear dresses of the Irish fashion. This edict leads us to suppose that they had a form and shape for their garments peculiar to themselves. The yellow, or saffron color, is often mentioned as being a very favorite hue, and one which they usually employed in dyeing their habits.

Spenser greatly censured the ancient Irish dress. He considered the cloak "a fit house for an outlaw, a meet bed for a rebel, and an apt cloke for a thief." He also strongly objects to the custom of women wearing mantles, and mentions several articles of their dress: "a linen roll which they sometimes wear upon their heads, a thick linen shirt, a long-sleeved smock, a half-sleeved coat, and silken fillet." And Camden informs us that when, in Queen Elizabeth's reign, the Prince of Ulster came to the English court, with his attendants, they all wore "their hair flowing in long locks upon their shoulders, and had shirts dyed with saffron; their sleeves were large, their tunics short, and their mantles jagged."

A writer of the reign of James I. says: "Touching the mean or wild Irish, it may be truly said of them, which of old was spoken of the Germans; namely, that they wander slovenly and naked. The gentlemen, or lords of counties, wear close breeches and stockings, of the same piece of cloth, of red, or such light color, and a loose coat, and a cloak, or a three-cornered mantle, of coarse light stuff, made at home, and their linen is coarse; and," adds the writer, "their shirts, before the last rebellion, were made of twenty or thirty ells, folded in wrinkles, and colored with saffron. * * * The women," he goes on to say, "living among the English, wear linen, a gown, and a mantle, and cover their heads in the Turkish fashion, with many ells of linen, only the Turkish turban is more round at the top, while that worn by the Irish is flatter and broader." Speed also speaks of wide-sleeved linen shirts, stained yellow, the mantles, and the skins, and says: "The women wore their hair plaited in a curious manner, hanging down their backs and shoulders, from under the folded wreaths of fine linen rolled about their heads."

From the time of Charles II. the gentlemen in Ireland are said to have gradually abandoned the national costume, and to have adopted the English fashions. The lower orders, however, retained their dress to a much later period, and even now the brogues and mantles are constantly seen, and still oftener the feet unincumbered with shoes or stockings.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE TOILET IN NORWAY.

THE ancient dress of the Norwegian peasants was made of the reindeer's skin. From what old authors say, it seems to have consisted of a cloak or mantle; but we find that about the middle of the eleventh century, when King Oluf Haraldren founded the city of Bergen, he brought thither a great many foreign merchants, who carried their fashions with them. In the Norwegian Chronicles we read: "Then the Norwegians took up many foreign cusoms and dresses, such as fine-laced hose, golden plates buckled round their legs, high-heeled shoes, stitched with silk, and covered with tissue of gold, jackets that buttoned on the side, with sleeves ten feet long, very narrow, and plaited up to the shoulders."

By this account, we may imagine that the Norwegians were eager followers of fashion, and that at the time of which Snoro Sturleson writes, they dressed like other European nations. We find, however, in another part of the same work, that the long garments were not quite discarded in Norway till about the year 1100, and then King Magnus Olufsen introduced short clothes and bare legs.

The lower order of peasants rarely trouble themselves about Fashion's vagaries; and the natives of this foreign clime still retain the costume that has descended to them from father to son. Some wear breeches and stockings all in one, and waistcoats of the same, and, if they wish to be very smart, they cover the seams with cloth of a different color.

The Hardanger peasants always wear black clothes edged with red; the Vaasserne wear all black; the Strite, white, edged with black; and those near Soynesford, prefer black and yellow; so that almost every parish has its own color.

They wear on their heads a broad-brimmed hat, or else a gray, brown, or black cap. Their shoes are without heels, and consist of two pieces of leather; the upper part sits close to the foot, and the other is joined to it in folds. In winter, they have laced half-boots, but when on the ice they put on skates, about ten feet long, covered with seal-skin. The peasants never wear a neckcloth, but leave their throats and necks entirely uncovered. Sometimes they fasten a leathern belt round the body, to hold their knives and other implements.

At church, and on holidays, the Norwegian women wear laced jackets and leathern girdles, adorned with silver. They are also fond of a chain, which they put three or four times round their necks, and hang a gilt ornament at the end of it. Their handkerchiefs and caps are covered with plates of silver, brass, and tin, buttons, and rings; and, of the latter, they wear quantities on their fingers. The young women plait their hair, and, while employed in their household affairs, they wear a shift and a petticoat; the collar of the former reaches to the throat, and they have a sack, generally of a black color, twisted round the waist. The linen they wear is very fine, and this simple costume is said to be very becoming.

AUNT MILLY'S VISIT TO THE WATERING-PLACE.

BY FANNY BRACY.

AUNT MILLY considered herself an invalid, not that she had any particular complaint or suffered at all from debility. But she had been for years accustomed to sigh and moan habitually, to tie a handkerchief around her face lest that lately fashionable terror neuralgia should make her a victim. She ate rye bread for fear of dyspepsia, took seltzer every morning to guard against nervous headache, and never drank coffee or green tea, for the same reason. When winter set in, she was swallowed in flannel, because her father had been dreadfully afflicted with rheumatism, and it was said to be hereditary. She kept cough drops in her pocket, and took posset every night, for her chest was weak; she dreaded walking fast because she was sure that she was threatened with palpitation of the heart, and when she drove out, sank back in the carriage overwhelmed with the exertion of asking John if everything were safe—shafts, axle-tree, springs, wheels, tires, harness, reins, and check-reins.

My uncle Jones called in physicians, and consulted medical works. He could find nothing in reference to her many nervous attacks, and gave up in despair. Numberless were the plain bread pills Aunt Milly swallowed, countless the vials of colored waters that she imbibed. She could not sleep without two pills at night, and fancied herself dying, if, throughout the day, her teaspoonful of mixtures had been omitted, or five minutes of the exact time had been allowed to elapse before her maid prepared them.

She knew by heart the name of every watering-place in the Union, and declared that she would die, a victim to Mr. Jones's indifference, if she were to be deprived of the benefit attending Sulphur Springs, Sweet Springs, sea-bathing, and salt air.

He had a holy horror of travelling. He could not be convinced of the necessity of shifting from place to place, deprived of his usual comforts, when he could stay at home and have everything he wanted. So, for years, Aunt Milly was allowed to groan and hint, and tie up her head in vain. She could not move his obdurate heart, and resigned herself to die of neglect.

"My dear, you can go where you like," said he; "but you must not expect me to accompany you. I am no invalid, and have always a good appetite, and a fondness for my own bed, unfested by little unmentionable insects that devour you in hotels and wayside inns. So leave me at home, and travel from South to North, and East to West. Drink sulphur water, bathe in hot springs, enjoy salt air, and sleep in dirty places, since you have a fancy for it; but let me have my way here."

"I sleep in dirty places, Mr. Jones! You forget yourself, indeed! When did I ever express a liking that way, sir? But let me die. You know I cannot go without you, ill and feeble as I am. I am resigned to my fate, poor, neglected creature! Oh, my side! My heart beats so painfully! Joanna! quick with the white mixture! Joanna! Joanna! Mr. Jones, will you ring the bell? Don't you see the state I'm in?"

"I do, and hear, too," said he, seizing the bell-rope. "But you look remarkably well under the excitement, Milly; and you only want exercise and fresh air to make you a sensible woman once more. Whereas, with your swaddling in flannel, burying yourself in your room, and drugging from sunrise till sunset, you are getting to be like a withered apple—withered and screwed into wrinkles while you are yet a young woman; for a woman of thirty-nine is by no means old, unless illness, and a fancy for illness, make her so."

"You are surely crazy, Mr. Jones," cried my aunt, rising and looking in the glass. "I look withered! How decidedly ungentlemanly of you to say so! I defy you to show me a more youthful-looking woman of my age than I am; and will thank you not to remember my years either, or to show a greener memory. I am not thirty-nine yet, thank Heaven!"

"Well, convince me of that, Milly, and I'll be as green as you can expect," said he, slyly, as he winked his eye at me. "When were you born, my dear?"

"Pshaw, Mr. Jones! What is the use of being so foolish? Go and ask my grandmother such questions. She could tell to a minute: old people are forever talking about ages. It seems to be one of their infirmities." And here Aunt Milly rather tossed her head.

"Well, may be so, Milly; but is it not singular that you should be losing your memory at your time of life? Your grandmother has been dead these fifteen years past, and you bid me go and ask her about your birth!"

"La, Jones, you know I was jesting," said his wife, a little put out.

"Well, then, Milly, let's be serious now." And my uncle took a chair. "Every year I am tormented with your passion for travelling. Now we are going to make a bargain. Does it never occur to you that you might lose your husband's affection by this constant hypochondria of yours—don't interrupt me—this cessation of all pleasant intercourse between man and wife? There was a time, Milly, when our tastes were mutual; you loved me enough to try and make me happy, and I was happy. I love you as fondly as ever, because I am not one to change; yet there is but little domestic bliss falling to my share now. You complain all day, and leave me to enjoy myself as I can, without interesting yourself any more in my pursuits than if I were a stranger."

Aunt Milly began to cry; but he went on earnestly, not stopping to comfort her as usual, and I could see that this was the "crisis," as the doctors term it.

"Now, I detest travelling; I have a horror of your fashionable watering-places; but, for our mutual benefit, I will promise to go with you where you like, if you, in your turn, will promise to get well before we come home again."

"How do I know that I will recover my health?" asked Aunt Milly, wiping her eyes. "I think it wrong to exact such a promise from an uncertain, impotent mortal."

"As you please, my dear," said Uncle Jones, thrusting his hands in his pockets; "as you please. I have made you a reasonable offer, and on those conditions alone will I accompany you when you wish to go. So make up your mind, and let me know your decision."

Decision was a fearful word to Aunt Milly. She had never been decided in all her life, and it was late to begin now. She looked at me, at Joanna, and at her husband; but we dared not look up, and she took her knitting from the work-stand.

"You see, Fanny," said she, throwing the yarn across her little finger; "you see, my dear, I cannot promise to get well just in one moment, as your uncle wishes. Suppose that I should not improve, I couldn't come back home to run about, here and there, as I used to. But, Lord! if I were to miss the opportunity! Fanny, I wish you would advise me, child. Do you think I'll be benefited enough by the change of air to get my strength again? Don't tell me that you can't tell. Can't you reflect? If I go, I may get well, to be sure; but then—oh, I declare, Mr. Jones is provoking! But, then, how am I to promise, when I can't? I vow it is too bad to exact such unjustifiable things from people whose nerves are as weak as mine! I do believe he thinks I can get well when I make up my mind to it, as if it depended on me."

My uncle whistled, and put on his hat.

"Well, Milly, take your time about deciding. I'll give you all day. And, meanwhile, I'll take my gun and bring you a bag of game for your dinner."

"Now do stop, John! What is the use of flying off in that way? How, in the name of common sense, can you leave me in this way? There, he is gone, and I really don't know what to do. Joanna, see if all my morning caps are nicely done up; you know I must have them all. But, you see, Fanny, if I should not improve, I will lose the benefit of Dr. Ring's attendance and his excellent medicines. I may die in consequence of your uncle's unfeeling conduct. Perhaps, however, I had better go, and try what virtue there is in salt bathing. See to my collars, my dear; look over them carefully to-day, and make me some fresh knots to wear with them. If I do go, I must make a good appearance. I declare, Fanny, I am bewildered. Send for Mrs. Martin to come in, my child; I'll consult her. She is a woman of excellent judgment, and knows my disease as well as a physician."

I was rejoiced at this. Mrs. Martin was an excellent auxiliary, and a good friend. She did not always agree with Aunt Milly about her ill health, for she comprehended that it was a mania for medicine and nervousness indulged. They had known each other since childhood, and Aunt Milly loved her dearly, in spite of their arguments.

So I dispatched Joanna, and, shortly after, saw Mrs. Martin riding up the lane in a brisk trot. I hastened to meet her.

"Fanny, how do you do? What is the matter with Milly now? More nerves to-day?"

I explained as I led her in, and she nodded her head approvingly, promising to influence my aunt as far as she was able, as it was an excellent idea. I left them together, and went to look at the collars and knots, convinced of the result; and, before I had quite finished, Joanna came to call me, as her mistress had made up her mind to go, and wanted me immediately.

How hard we worked I cannot say, for the entire household was topsy turvy for my aunt's sake. Washing, ironing, clear starching, sewing, mending, and running errands after ribbons, muslins, and laces. When all was ready, and I saw the carriage at the door, I could not help pitying my uncle. He walked about uneasily, gave orders concerning his gun and hunting accoutrements, fishing-rods and flags; but I could see how he hated the prospect before him of discomfort and daily annoyance. I do believe he would have been glad if Aunt Milly had remained, and been all nerves for the rest of her days.

At length they set off, my aunt crying bitterly, and Joanna in a whirl of delight at seeing "some-thin' 'sides the everlastin' piny woods." The journey was short enough; but her mistress looked upon it as a dreadful undertaking, and I wondered, as I went in the house, whether my uncle's plan would cure her of hypochondria, or bring her back a victim to coughs, colds, and imaginary catarrhs.

I had enough to do in their absence, and a week passed swiftly enough. My uncle wrote to say that they had reached their first place of destination, and wished himself safe home again. "So I believe Milly does, if she would acknowledge it," added he; "but I am determined to make her believe I am more and more charmed as she grows more disgusted."

Three weeks from the day they arrived at ———, I was surprised to see a carriage coming along the lane, loaded with trunks and carpet-bags. I went to the door, and wondered who it could be; for, although we had plenty of visiting neighbors, I did not expect any one to stay while my aunt was gone. The horses came slowly on until they reached the circle in front of the house. Then they whirled in, the driver drew in his reins, and I recognised my uncle and his wife!

"What on earth has happened?" cried I, springing down the steps, and catching Aunt Milly in my arms. "Is my aunt ill?"

"Oh, Fanny, my child! I'm so glad to get back! So enchanted! You may well kiss your uncle, for he is a person of excellent sound sense."

He winked his eye mischievously at me, and my aunt went up the front steps unassisted, a thing she had not done for years.

"Come along, child, I'm dying to tell you all. Come on, Mr. Jones, I want you to listen, or Fanny will certainly think I am exaggerating."

Here, Joanna lifted a basket awkwardly, and out rolled a large box of pills, the contents scattering in every direction. She flew to pick them up, but my aunt interposed—

"Let the pills go, Joanna, I don't mind them; bring in the things, and set them in my room."

I looked at my uncle, who smiled significantly, and we followed Aunt Milly in the hall, then into the sitting-room, where, having satisfactorily possessed herself of her individual rocking-chair and foot-stool, she ordered me to sit near her. I suggested that she had better divest herself of her bonnet and mantilla, which she laughingly declared she had forgotten. At length she composed herself, and I prepared to listen with all my ears, for I was wondering what to think of the sudden return and my aunt's recovery.

"Now, Fanny, you can never imagine the dirt we eat, drank, saw, and slept in, during our four days' journey. I thought I should die outright; but your uncle declared it was delightful, and pretended that he found everything cleaner than it was at home. Just think of that, my dear child! He wouldn't agree with me in a single opinion I expressed, and wished the distance were greater yet from here to ———. The evening we arrived, there was a ball, and everybody's head seemed to be turned. We waited for an hour in the hotel parlor before we could get a room, there was such a crowd; and the women peeped at me, and giggled like so many fools, walking arm in arm with gentlemen whom I took to be their husbands and brothers, but found out afterwards 'twas no such thing. Well, at last we were led to our rooms; two poor little pens, with a comfortless appearance that chilled me. I went to bed directly, telling Jones to send my tea up to me; but waited two mortal hours for it, Joanna running down every five minutes to try and get it. When it did come, it was a slop, to be sure! Fodder tea would be nectar to it, upon my word. I couldn't drink it, and, in despair, tried to sleep. Oh, Fanny, such beds and pillows! If they were not stuffed with oyster-shells, they were with pounded brickbats, for I never laid my poor head upon such stony things in all my life. Fortunately, I had brought two pillows with me, and I sent after the baggage that remained down stairs. My dear child, I had to wait till next morning! Then I rolled up some of my shawls under my head, and hoped to rest; but the music began in the ball-room, and I was nearly wild. Your uncle came up laughing fit to kill himself, and insisted on my getting up and dressing myself to go and see them dance. You may imagine, Fanny, how miserable I must have felt when I consented to this; but I put on my black levantine and a new cap, and took Jones's arm. We reached the ball-room at last, and found a seat. Everybody was up on the floor, it seemed to me, for my head was in a whirl. The men all looked drunk, and half the women, instead of being dressed, were in their bodied petticoats. I wanted to go out, but Jones would not let me, so I looked on. The queerest dances you ever saw were performing; for it certainly was a performance. The gentlemen hugged their partners close to their breasts, and, with their faces close together, they began to slide first one side then another, and then hop all round on one foot. Some just slid, others gave a little kick, then a hop, and then a kick again, all the time as close as could be to one another. You may well open your big eyes, Fanny; for I would sooner see you dead than engaged in those improper dances. I thought, at first, that they were dancing with their husbands, these half-dressed ladies; but I give you my word, that I never saw man and wife together while I was away. They didn't seem to care a snap for one another, and flirted worse than any wild unmarried belle I ever heard of.

"Well, at twelve o'clock, they had supper, and your uncle dragged me along. There were bony chickens and thin turkeys, oyster soup and fried oysters. Sloppy blanmange, stale cakes, and blue milk frozen into what they called ice-cream. Oh,

Fanny, I thought of our delicious ice-cream, and your sponge-cake, and wondered how people could eat such stuff! Well, to go on, the ladies stood in groups, and their partners helped them; but to such loads of food! And to see how they tumbled! Why, child, your uncle don't drink as much in one month as these women in a night; and sometimes they drank out the same glass with a gentleman. Oh, I can't tell you how shocked I was! I insisted on going back to my room; and, tired to death, I did sleep, in spite of the hard pillows.

"Well, next morning I was waked by hearing a man's voice call out, 'Mrs. Jones! Mrs. Jones! will you go bathing this morning? Mrs. Armor is ready, and we are only waiting for you.' I sat up in bed, and looked around. Your uncle had gone down, and there I was alone, a man at my door asking me to go and bathe with him and some one else! I sprang out of bed and latched the door, trembling from head to foot; and, after a while, the impudent creature went down. Joanna came up and dressed me, and I sat waiting for your uncle, intending to make him call this person to account, if he could discover him. Some one knocked at the door, and Joanna opened it. There stood a waiter with a glass of julep that held a quart, and a long straw stuck into it. 'This is Mrs. Jones's julep,' said he, bowing to me. 'Mr. Hall sends it with his compliments, and hopes she does not feel badly after her bath.' I was furious. 'I have not bathed this morning, and do not drink; you must make a mistake. Shut the door, Joanna.' And he went to the next door. I could hardly keep from crying at this fresh insult; and, when your uncle came, could scarcely find words to tell him what had passed. My dear, he laughed at me, and said I must have been dreaming!"

Here, Uncle Jones threw himself back in the chair and shook with laughter. My aunt looked reproachfully at him, and I tried hard not to join in his mirth, but smile I must, I could not help it.

"I went down to breakfast—Fanny, listen to me—and couldn't eat a thing. The table-cloth was dirty, and the butter a smash. There must have been two hundred in the room, and their loud talking deafened me. I went back to my room, and tried to swallow some of my pills; but they made me sick. I lay down to rest, and, about eleven, your uncle told me to go down and bathe, as the bath-house was empty. So down I went, and had been there about fifteen minutes, when a perfect swarm of women and children rushed in. I wanted to get out of the water, but thought I would wait until they were all in, so that I could dress in peace. Such a clatter and screaming, as they all plunged in, hooting and hallooing! Some could swim, and some were learning, so they kicked about manfully, looking at me as if I were a crocodile, and talking French. I got out, and dressed as well as I could, and went up to the hotel. They sent up a lunch of bread and smashes, with a few streaks of ham. I ate this with pleasure, for I was hungry, and your uncle brought me a glass of India ale that was very nice. The place was quiet enough, for all the people were out to bathe, and I fell asleep over that nice book, 'David Copperfield.' I was waked by a knock at the door: 'Mrs. Jones, here's a capital cocktail for you!' The same voice that was after me in the morning. What he meant by a cocktail, I don't know; but I wouldn't answer, and he went off. Cocktail is a mixture of brandy and bitters, child, I found out afterwards; for every day this same insolent creature came to my door, inviting me to bathe, and sending me juleps and cocktails."

Here my uncle set off again, and this time I joined him, and laughed heartily, for my aunt's indignation was irresistible. She looked at us steadily, but did not call Joanna for ether, as was her wont; and, after a pause, went on with her story.

"Well, you would never laugh, Fanny, if you were to go to a public place and see women dancing in their petticoats, bathing with anybody, and drinking things with such low names as cocktails. For two good weeks I endured this, and being every morning roused out of my sleep by that monster calling me to go and bathe with him. For two good weeks I saw more flirting and parleyvoing, more skipping, hopping, and drinking than a woman of my character and principles ever ought to witness; and I never had spirits during all the time to take my medicines; for I was afraid to ring the bell for Joanna, lest the eternal julep and cocktail man should answer it. So one thing I've gained by my journey, I find I can do without them and feel very well."

"Eureka!" cried my uncle, jumping up and giving her a hearty kiss. "Here is my own Milly come to life! And now, my dear, I'll tell you a secret: your morning visitor and your julep offers, were all intended for your neighbor in the next room, another Mrs. Jones."

"Why, John! why did you not undeceive me? I was so very much annoyed."

"Well, Milly, to tell you the truth, I thought I would allow you to be as much disgusted with watering-places as you really are. I knew that you would not have time to faint and stuff yourself with bread pills."

"Bread pills, John Jones! What do you mean?" cried Aunt Milly.

"Simply that you have swallowed nothing but bread pills since your maladies showed themselves," said he, dryly, resorting to his old way of thrusting his hands in his pockets.

"Is it possible! How abominable!" Aunt Milly was ready to cry. "One thing, then, I will say, you have all treated me shamefully; but I have been well punished by hearing this, and my visit to that horrid watering-place."

"And yet it cured you, aunty," said I, mischievously.

"Now, Fanny Bracy!—now, Fanny Bracy!" and my aunt looked daggers; but from that day she has been as active as a squirrel, as busy as a bee, and as merry as a lark. So, at least, says my uncle, and he ought to know.

VEGETABLE PHYSIOLOGY.

BY HARLAND COULTAS.

PLANTS COMPOSED OF A SINGLE ROW OF CELLS.—In this case, the cell is multiplied by division combined with subsequent expansion, which takes place in one direction only. A cell is first elongated, and a partition is seen to project across its middle, by which it is divided into two cells; one of these cells again elongates, and is again subdivided in a similar manner: in this way, a plant is produced consisting of a simple or branching series of cells placed end to end. Such plants can be seen in any shallow stream of water which is exposed to the light. They appear like threads of vegetable matter, and, collectively, form that bright green ooze which attaches itself to the stones and pebbles of the stream. The extension of the parts of plants or vegetable growth, in all ordinary cases, is effected by this mode of cell-multiplication.

In the simplest plant in nature, the plant-cell, both the reproductive and nutritive processes are carried on by the same cell. So also in the Diatomaceæ, a species of marine algæ, where the union of plant-cells is only temporary, the organs of nutrition and reproduction are still identical. The cells of these plants are at first united, but afterwards spontaneously disarticulate and break up, exhibiting well-marked spontaneous movements, insomuch that some naturalists have referred them to the animal kingdom, to which they certainly approximate. The cells thus separated, under suitable conditions, individually develop into new and independent plants.

But when plant-cells unite together permanently, as they do in the higher forms, the organs of nutrition and reproduction are no longer identical or confined to the same cell; on the contrary, some of the cells are specialized or set apart for nutrition, and others for reproduction.

When plant-cells combine together, and a line or plane of cells is produced, they form what physiologists call a tissue. It must be evident that such plants are more composite in their mode of growth. A tree, philosophically considered, is not an individual, as is commonly supposed, but a community of individuals. Every bud which develops on the branch is, in fact, a phyton, or new plant, and is capable of forming the germ of an independent existence: it is but a repetition of the same process of growth, and of the plant itself, from which it differs only in having no free radical extremity, like the parent plant, developed in the soil. Now, when plant-cells combine into a simple or branching series of cells, their union with each other evidently corresponds to the union of the phytons in the flowering plants, the growth of each cell being, as we have already shown, simply a repetition of the same process, or of the same plant-cell; and, although each plant-cell in the series thus united together is capable of propagating the species, which it actually does when they are separate from each other naturally, yet, when they remain together, certain cells are specialized for propagation and others for nutrition.

This is beautifully exemplified in the Mucar, or bread-mould (Fig. 1), which consists, as to the creeping part at its base, of long, thread-like and branching cells, the partitions of which have been wholly absorbed, so that they form continuous tubes, whilst its upright portion, or stem, is composed of a single row of cells, formed by the process of division already explained, the terminal cell containing the reproductive matter or spores. In Fig. 2, the Penicillium glaucum, another mould, we have a somewhat different arrangement of the reproductive cells, which, instead of being inclosed in a solitary terminal cell, are arranged side by side, forming a number of bead-like branches at the summit of the stem. These cells ultimately separate, and grow into new individuals.

Let us pause for a few moments, and reflect on the simplicity and beauty of these admirable productions of nature. Think of the Liriodendron tulipifera, or tulip-tree, the pride of the American forests. Its wide-spread and powerful roots, its tall and massive stem, its glorious and far-extended canopy of foliage and flowers; this is the result of centuries of assimilation from inorganic matter, of the evolution of countless myriads of cells. Now look at the little bread-mould, which nature constructs from decaying organic matter in a few short hours. In this plant, we have the problem of vegetable nutrition and reproduction reduced to the last degree of simplicity: the whole process is seen in these interesting plants, as it were, in miniature, beneath the microscope. The basis, or foundation of the plant corresponding to the root, consists of a few interwoven tubular cells, the upright portion the analogue of the stem of a few cells strung end to end, and the terminal cell at its summit is the humble representative of the flowering or reproductive part of the plant, the most highly organized and striking portion of the fabric of all plants, and to which the vegetable creation owes all its splendor.

Yet, after all, although nature has thus beautifully simplified the common laws of vegetable life for our instruction, how little do we in reality know about it! We do not know how the cells of the bread-mould originate, why they are developed in this particular form, why they are so few in number, and why the terminal cell should be specialized or set apart for reproduction. Could we but answer these simple questions, we could explain the formation of vegetable out of mineral matter, and those mysterious and sublime operations by which nature clothes the earth with this endless variety of vegetable form. But, although the acutest philosophers have directed their closest scrutiny to the problem of vegetable development, and particularly of cell-growth, a thick cloud still continues to rest over this department of physiological science.

THE SCARF AND CROSS; OR, "THERE'S MAGIC IN THE WEB OF IT."

FROM THE FRENCH.

BY ROSE ASHLEY

CHAPTER I.

THE noble Chevalier Herman, of Meringer, loved the young and beautiful Matilda, of Malsbourg. He was fortunate in being also beloved by her. It was during the time of the Crusades, that great heroic era of Christianity, when Europe and Asia, the Christian and Mussulman federations, Rome and Bagdad, Christ and Mohammed, Pope and Caliph, had shown themselves under the walls of the city of David, to determine an old quarrel of five centuries; and the two rival worlds equally collected their subjects in the prosecution of a holy war. Roused by the ardent summons of a passionate friar, the people of Christian Europe started and awoke. Their souls were full of enthusiasm, and, in a moment, at the supposed voice of religion, her multitudes, seeking glory and adventure, covered the thousand pathways of France, England, and Germany, lance in hand, red cross on white tunic, and banner waving in the wind. Kingdoms were to be conquered; the oppressed to be rescued and sustained; the holy sepulchre to be delivered; and, above all, that beautiful sun of Asia, that magnificent country of the East, filled with marvels, and abounding in light and perfumes, was to be yielded up to Christian keeping.

The noble Herman was among the rest to cry, "Deus Vult!"—"It is the will of God." He shared in the enthusiasm, had taken up the cross, and sworn at Notre Dame to accomplish the warlike pilgrimage, now almost enjoined by the Church as a Christian duty, to the holy sepulchre. No wonder, then, if the young Matilda should be sad, sad as an autumnal evening; if the tears were seen to stream from her blue eyes down her fair, soft cheeks; if her eyes were now, from time to time, raised towards Heaven in as much despondency as hope, as if there seeking the aid and protection which earth seemed only to deny.

It was, in those days, an old and pious custom among those who loved, to make, at parting, certain mutual gifts, which should keep them in remembrance: a glove, a scarf, a jewel, some toy or trifle, which, however valueless in itself, might possess a precious significance in the eyes of love. Not that those who truly love have any need of such remembrance; but that, by these visible symbols, the fond eyes keep always before them a token which prevents them from wandering, as certainly as the heart. Our lovers did not differ from the rest of the world. They, too, had little treasures to exchange, upon which affection had set her name and seal, and from which sympathy could always gather sufficient provocation for her tears. The gift of our Crusader to his betrothed was a splendid missal, exquisitely embellished and illuminated by one of the most skillful artists of the neighboring abbey. In return, he received from her a scarf embroidered with a blue cross, which she cautioned him never to discard, as it possessed a nameless virtue. They then renewed the most tender assurances at parting, swearing, as most lovers do on such occasions, eternal love; and, having for the last time embraced the sad and blushing fair one, the noble Herman took the road to Venice, that cherished daughter of the Adriatic Sea, from whence he embarked for the Holy Land.

The seas sped his progress. He was soon landed on the shores profaned by the pagan; and very brief was the interval before the struggle followed between the iron-clad soldiery of Europe with the light-armed, but vigorous and elastic chivalry of the East.

"It was a spectacle of surpassing beauty," writes one who beheld it, "the first combat which followed between the opposing armies. In the distance, the morning sun is lighting up the blue mountains and the widely rolling sea. Before us, the plain is covered with the warlike thousands who are about to meet. There they rush careering on their steeds, their glittering equipage and armor multiplying and casting back, with sinister lights, the dazzling glances of the sun. Anon, there is a terrible rush, as of the waters of the raging sea—a noise, confused and undefinable, but which fills the heart with unspeakable apprehensions. Suddenly, the sound subsides. A silence follows quite as terrible as was the storm; a silence like that of the same ocean, when the tempest has sunk into repose. Again the tumult rises, swells, grows as it proceeds, while dense clouds of dust envelop the contending armies, and almost shut from sight the soft beauties of the far blue sky above. Death, that child of darkness, that mother of silence, is accomplishing her work. Another, and a deeper silence ensues. At a distance only is it broken, while at intervals burst forth the cries of triumph and exultation of those who stand among and above the slain. The pure winds of heaven once more break over the bosom of the earth. They sweep the dust from the field of conflict. The cloud disappears, and unveils the dead and dying. The survivors have sped in pursuit, leaving horror and blood behind them, with the loathsome jackal alone to prey upon the unconscious kinsman and the friend. Oh, surely, the field of battle is a most glorious spectacle!"

But what became of our Herman, the betrothed of the fair Matilda, on that bloody field of Palestine, for which his eager soul had thirsted so long? Alas, the question! Sudden are the changes in the sky of March, but still more suddenly change our destinies. The noble Lord of Meringer has fallen into the hands of the infidels. His fate was a cruel one. For six dreary hours he had fought, almost entirely unsupported, against a crowd of enemies; at length a mighty stroke, breaking in pieces his armor, left him incapable of defence and of movement, beneath the feet of his horse. The stroke, however, supposed to be mortal, did but stun him; a marvellous circumstance; not even shedding a drop of his blood! The sword of the pagan warrior, though tempered in the living waters of the Baraddi, which runs by Damascus, could not cut through the scarf of the fair Matilda; that scarf of white with the blue cross, which our hero always carried next to his bosom. "There was magic in the web of it."

Become a prisoner, he was, with his unfortunate companions, degraded to the labors of the field. Our poor French captives were thus doomed to till the lands they had only come to reap, and were driven to the work with strokes, which not unfrequently moistened the furrows with their blood. Herman bore his lot with the meek submission of a Christian. He neither complained of the labor, nor resented the blows and bonds of his tormentors. Their strokes, indeed, fell unharmed upon the scarf of Matilda.

This was a miracle! The curious circumstance at length reached the ears of the youthful prince, into whose hands the noble Lord of Meringer had fallen. He was curious to behold the man of whom he had heard this matter, and Herman was accordingly brought before him, when he demanded to know the history of his magic scarf. The chevalier meekly told his story, saying frankly that the scarf had been given him by the damsel whom he loved, the virtuous and beautiful Matilda of Malsbourg, of whose continued chastity and truth, the captive declared the sanctity and whiteness of the scarf to be a sufficient evidence: of its power for his own preservation, the proofs were every day apparent.

CHAPTER II.

THE young prince, being rich and powerful, with an excitable imagination, and fond of the marvellous, was naturally a seeker after adventure: just such a person as we so frequently read of among the caliphs and viziers of the Thousand and One Nights. He was impressed by the description given of Matilda, and determined secretly to visit France, and to spare neither gold nor presents in the attempt to win the affections of the betrothed of our captive knight; and, by this means, to see if the scarf would lose its virtue and change its color. He was not slow in carrying his resolution into effect. With great secrecy and diligence, he passed into the Christian country. It was a cold, bleak evening in winter when he arrived at the foot of the tower where dwelt the young heiress of Malsbourg. He was fortunate in beholding her the very first moment of his arrival. Heedless of the cold and biting winds, she was even then leaning out from the turret, sending her eyes afar, as if seeking to discern, amidst the whiteness of the snow which covered the vast plain before her, the black plume of her knight faintly glimmering in the distance: striving to distinguish, amidst the noise of the wind, the sound of a well-known bugle. The form of the visitor appeared before her, and, for a moment, inspired her with a hope; which was, however, soon dissipated when the faithful warder, Dietrich, throwing open the gates of the castle, admitted our adventurous sultan. The sight of a stranger, whose features told her nothing but that they were bronzed by the intense sun of Asia, only filled her heart with new terrors and apprehensions, which the deep sigh which he uttered as he surveyed her person only tended to increase. She had everything to fear from a messenger coming from the East, in place of Herman; but the stranger only implored hospitality, and made no present revelations. His prayer was necessarily granted. The inclemency of the season was a sufficient plea to the heart of charity for the lonely wayfarer at such a bitter time.

It is related in the legend of Dr. Faustus, that, one day, Mephistopheles tempted the fair Margaret with rich ornaments of pearls and diamonds. The poor child trembled, hesitated, and finally allowed herself to become his victim; and this is the history of very many of the daughters of Eve. Our sultan resorted to a like influence to persuade the fair Matilda. She beheld, in one night, at her feet, all the riches of the East. She heard her pagan suitor swear that her betrothed, the noble Herman, would forever drag the plough of the infidel unless she yielded to his entreaties. The sultan was beautiful as a fallen angel, and as eloquent as the Devil when he tempted the mother of mankind in the garden; and yet—and yet he failed. The fair Matilda turned over the golden leaves of her missal, and remained faithful to her lover. When left to herself, she mourned over the cruel destiny under which Herman suffered in a heathen land, and prayed the Virgin to give her strength and means to deliver him from his enemies.

Did the Virgin listen to her prayer? Did the maiden leave it to prayer alone? We shall see.

Though swiftly roll the waves, yet still more swiftly pass our days. The infidel, hopeless of his arts, has returned to Syria with empty coffers. He has gained nothing by his adventure, and his gifts were all fruitless with the fair Matilda. Herman still labored with his companions at the plough, and his scarf still remained immaculate as the white wing of the cherubim.

Soon after this time, there arrived at the court of our sultan an unknown singing-master. His pale face, long, fair hair, smooth chin, and blue eyes—in short, his whole appearance showed that he was from the West, from those cold and melancholy countries so often hid from the entreaties of the sun.

The stranger sang, accompanying himself with the sounds of an ebony harp, inlaid with ivory, which he brought with him. His sweet strains captivated the assembled crowd. He sang, in a pure and limpid voice, the joys of one's native country; then he changed his notes, and the spirit of his muse became that of the clarion, as he sang the hymn of combat and the joys of triumph. In a more tranquil mood, he told of love—love which baffles all sorrows, and heals every wound. He detailed, for the delight of the fierce, but curious and story-loving Syrians, the original legends of the West—harmonious echoes of a marvellous and poetic past. He described the lovely Emma, the royal fiancée of a powerful monarch, who sacrificed a throne for a humble student—who encountered, on behalf of Eginhard, the fearful wrath of the great Emperor Charlemagne, her sire. This legend led to others. He told of a mysterious cavalier, who descended the green banks of the Rhine in a bark, which was drawn, with a chain of silver, by a swan of incomparable whiteness; who rescued the lovely orphan from the tower where she was kept, and, having espoused her, disappeared as suddenly as he came, like some sad and sombre spectre, only from being vexed by an imprudent question. Then followed the story of Nothurga, that beautiful and pious maiden, who, being betrothed to a knight who perished in a distant land, fled into exile rather than forget her faith, and buried herself in the remotest solitude. A white hind, which accompanied her to the desert, brought her daily, suspended about his neck in a basket, the nourishment which a faithful servant had procured. But when autumn arrived, and the last leaves and flowers had disappeared, the angels came with better nourishment, and transferred her pure spirit to a more certain refuge in Heaven. Still, however, though she herself no longer appears among the perishing flowers, her pure and lovely body preserves, though under its covering of hoar-frost, the germ of life in the beautiful little blue flower, the daisy, which she loved, and sleeps sweetly shrouded in roses that never fail to bloom at the proper season above her grave, on the pleasant banks of the Neckar.

With this plaintive romance, the minstrel ended his touching ballads, which declared the sufferings of the soul, and, with gracious symbols of hope, pointed to that celestial flower which alone defies the winds and the waves of life. The voice of the musician had varied with his song. It had become more thrilling than at first, while his eye grew more and more animated, his gestures more expressive; inspiration seemed to open from his soul the sweet secret of a better future, and he seemed to tremble with very excess of happiness—even as the swallow, who, after having fatigued his wings in traversing a stormy sea, perceives, at sunset, once more in view the precious spot of earth where it finds a home—the murmuring fountain, the green plain, the fresh shade, and the dear maternal nest.

It was like so much magic to the ears of the sultan and his court, the songs of the pale and light-haired stranger. Poetry is naturally grand and powerful under the starry sky of the orient. There, music possesses a natural melody, particularly under the shade of the minarets of Antioch and Smyrna, at those seasons when the drooping earth is refreshed by breezes from Libanus; when the birds bury themselves in the foliage from the piercing heats of noonday, and the locust chirps monotonously in the shade which he always loves; when the butterfly crouches above the moist places, or in the grass, and it is only the green lizard that turns up his emerald garments to the sun—there, to lie in the shade, with the soft, refreshing breeze stealing off to your embrace from the lonely mountain heights where they harbor, with the waters of the Ionian Sea gliding to your feet, then to hearken to the racenteur who delights you with equal poetry and music, is to realize the highest raptures of the day of Homer.

The sultan was equally liberal and magnificent. He must reward the musician who had delighted him with songs of such refreshing sweetness, and tales of such foreign interest and beauty. Brocades of gold tissue were cast at his feet, collars of precious stones were offered for his neck, harps of cedar wood, scarfs of silk, dyed richly with the famous purple of the Tyrian, and other gifts, no less valuable and precious, were offered for his acceptance by the grateful prince. We pass the mere bijouterie, the trifles which are simply beautiful and tasteful, and mention, among these other gifts, the ransom of fifty captives, the soul of a Jew, and the body of a beautiful Georgian captive—the one not dead, but living and beautiful, the other quite alive, and not wholly inaccessible, as we may conjecture, to a reasonable conversion. The young Frank musician rejected all these gifts, and demanded, as his recompense, only the privilege of rescuing one of the Christian captives from the labors of the Asian plough. His prayer was accorded him; and, conducted among the captives, his choice fell upon Herman, our knight of the white scarf and the cross of blue—that scarf which the scourge could never rend, which labor could not soil, which neither blood, nor toil, nor exposure to the pitiless storm, could impair or deprive of its first sweet purity and whiteness.

CHAPTER III.

THE Lord of Meringer, thus rescued from his bonds, naturally wished to return immediately to his beloved Matilda. His liberator desiring also to return to France, they embarked together, and arrived safely at a place about two days' journey from the château of Meringer. The travellers stopped at a hotel, and here the singing-master said to Herman—

“Brother, at this place we separate. We now take different routes. I pray thee now, at parting, that thou give me, as a remembrance, a small piece of the scarf of which the history is so wonderful, that I may be able, when I relate thy story, to have the proof in hand.”

The knight gladly yielded to an entreaty so moderate. He anxiously desired some means to prove his gratitude to the generous pilgrim who had procured for him his freedom. He cut off a bit of his charmed scarf, accordingly, and gave it him, with thanks and blessings. Exchanging other proofs of a mutual esteem, and promising to see each other again, as opportunity offered, they separated with much and sincere feeling.

Herman hastened to his betrothed. Once more he beheld the young heiress of Malsbourg. He finds her still beautiful as when he left her. Her smile still glows for him, and she is in all respects the same dear and beautiful Matilda. Yet there is a difference. There is a something more proud in the movements of her form; her figure seems more graceful, while more erect. There is a slight shade of mystery in her actions. From time to time, her hands seem to seek for a dagger at her girdle, and her fingers pass more hurriedly than they were wont in former days over the chords of her harp. There was a darker shade in her complexion, as if she had felt the smiles of a warmer sun than that of Malsbourg. There was surely no reason why Herman should not be happy; Matilda still beautiful, and still loving as of yore. But our knight was not happy. Fearful imaginings and suspicions filled his brain. They had told him, on his return, that a mystery hung about his betrothed. She, too, had been a wanderer. For twelve months had she been absent, and none knew whither. She had gone without a sign, and returned without an explanation. Our knight was miserable. His thoughts by day, his dreams by night, filled his soul with equal tortures. His peace was gone, his hopes vanished, all his sweet illusions were wrecked like the frail paper boat which the Hindoo maiden sends down the Ganges. Evil purposes fill his soul, and a sense of wrong makes him dream only of revenge, that banquet of supreme passion, which some one fables is worthy of the gods. In his gloom, Matilda forgets to smile. She knows not what to do or say; but she has hopes—hope, indeed, would seem natural to the fair, pure damsel, whose scarf and cross no weapon had been able to destroy.

CHAPTER IV.

SITUATED at the summit of a high mountain, the château of Meringer resembles, at a distance, some gigantic patriarch watching over the flock which lies scattered at his feet. It was night, and numberless sparkling lights scintillated fantastically through the divided panes of the high windows, which were distinguished by that peculiar shape which, in architecture, is termed ogee, or ogive. A burst of sonorous instruments, with powerful and harmonious voices, mingled with the great murmurs of the torrent which descends into the valley. The Count of Meringer had prepared a feast. One so magnificent had never been witnessed in the old château. Here he had assembled his friends and connections. Noble lords and stately dames gathered from the contiguous country. Matilda, too, was present. She came, at the urgent entreaties of her lover, filled with a secret presentiment of happiness reassured and made secure. She was magnificently attired; and, in the midst of the youthful company, with such finished and perfect features, with looks so equally chaste and sweet, and a smile so pure and pleading, one felt that she was lovely and without a model. Yet there were some to compare her to Diana in the midst of her nymphs, who, even while sporting in the simple pleasures of the fields and forests, kept ever in remembrance the precious beauties of her young Endymion.

The fête went on without interruption to its pleasures until nearly at the close, when the noble Count of Meringer, who, during the evening, had cast many a mournful and pitying look upon his betrothed, now rose and addressed the company. With his glass filled with the rich wine of Hungary, and pursuing his purpose only with the desperate air of one who leaps to a performance at which he revolts, since he feels that he cannot deliberately pursue it, he drank to the mutual release of himself and betrothed; alleging, as his reason for this decision, that she had been faithless to her vows.

Terribly fell the blow upon the young, fond heart of the poor innocent. The tears gushed from her eyes; but checking, with a sign, the ardent kinsmen who were prepared to rush upon her slanderer, she slowly, and with the most dignified meekness, silently left the scene in which she could not conceal her sorrows. Great was the confusion which followed. The guests were confounded. Words of doubt, dispute, and anger were heard on every side, and the noble Count of Meringer himself, now that Matilda had disappeared, was shocked and humbled at the offence of which he had been guilty.

Suddenly, and while the confusion in the hall was at its highest, the doors unfolded, and a stranger showed himself in the habit of a pilgrim. He was known to but one in the assembly, and that one was Herman. The new-comer was the famous singing-master, whose charming powers had won our baron from the thrall of the Saracen. He came forward, holding in his grasp the fragment of that precious white scarf, which, in the hour of his gratitude, our knight had given him. Scarcely had the Lord of Meringer welcomed him, and made his acknowledgments, than he became conscious of other features in those of the singing-master than he had before discovered. A gradual change was in progress, at the same moment, in the face of the stranger and in the heart of Herman. Surely it was Matilda of Malsbourg that stood before him, in the habit of the pilgrim. These are her eyes only, this her mouth, and these the features of life and beauty, the tout-ensemble of which made the whole perfect divinity which his soul had ever found in woman. The eye of the spectators was quite as quick in the discovery as his own. How had he been blind so long! He sank at her feet a penitent, reproaching himself, and entreating her in terms of the deepest self-reproach and contrition.

Do you ask if so rash an offender was admitted to pardon? Can you wonder that she took him to her mercy, she who was so full of grace? If her heart, which had so much love and constancy, so much chastity and purity, had pity also in as great degree? She raised him from her feet to her arms, with one of those sweet sighs which, from the heart of merriment, always informs us of the excellence of a world at once more happy and more pure than ours.

"These are the gifts of Art, and Art thrives most Where Commerce has enriched the busy coast;
He catches all improvements in his flight,
Spreads foreign wonders in his country's sight,
Imports what others have invented well,
And stirs his own to match them, or excel."

"WHAT beautiful, smooth, shining stuff your pelisse is made of, mother," said Emma Lord; "how can people spin such fine threads?"

Mrs. Lord was the right sort of woman for a good mother: she had warm feelings, quick apprehension, and self-control, which tempered the ardent expression till her character seemed only remarkable for the energy and precision with which she executed her plans of practical usefulness. Calm good sense was named as the prevailing attribute of her mind; yet she was, originally, very imaginative. But she had reasoned and read, and formed a standard of opinion and conduct which did not vary with every breeze of fashion. In particular, she had reflected much on the education of her family, and she knew that the most favorable moment to convey instruction to the mind of a child occurred only when the information was voluntarily sought. She never put off the inquiries of her children till she was at perfect leisure to attend to their questions. To be sure, she could not always enter into explanations; but she gave a few facts, or hints, or directions where the information sought might be obtained. And she always spoke in a kind, soft tone.

Now, Mrs. Lord had just returned from a walk, to call on a poor girl who was in want of work to earn bread for her suffering brothers and sisters, and her sick mother. Her thoughts were engrossed by the distress she had witnessed, and the ardent desire to find some effectual methods of relieving it, when the question of Emma recalled her heart to its favorite employment, the instruction of her own little family. And, as if glad of an opportunity to escape from the sad ideas which had been pressing on her spirits, she went on with more than her usual animation to detail the progress of the silk manufacture, in a manner intelligible to the comprehension of her child, showed her drawings of the worm, and the mulberry-tree—telling her where they were raised, and what numbers of persons, especially women and children, were employed in the care of the worms.

It must not be supposed that Mrs. Lord gave a connected and methodical view of the subject; she was often interrupted by the eager inquiries of her little girl, who wanted more to know the action of the drama than the particular qualities of the actors, or the process by which their respective parts were to be performed.

At length the curiosity of Emma seemed satisfied, and, leaning her bright cheek on the arm of the sofa, she sat for many minutes silent, and seemingly absorbed in thought. Mrs. Lord insensibly returned to her meditations on the sorrows and hardships of the destitute, of those who have known better days, and her heart was filled with an earnest desire to help them, and a deep and powerful emotion shook her frame, filling her eyes with tears that gushed forth unawares, as the idea flashed upon her mind with the vividness of lightning on the dark cloud, that she should realize her hope. Is not this the revelation that is made to pure and earnest faith? and warm and active benevolence has an assurance that God accepts the intention to do good, and will in his own way accomplish it.

"My dear mother," said Emma, shaking back her curls, "why do we not raise silk-worms here in America? I am sure we have land enough for mulberry-trees—and I know John will set out some trees, and Susan and I will take care of the worms; and mother, you say a great many people earn enough to buy all their food and clothes by selling the silk they reel off the cocoons—why do you not tell Mrs. Branley to raise silk-worms, and then she can buy shoes for her children to go to the Sunday-school?"

Mrs. Lord started from her chair; the words of the child opened before her a prospect of usefulness, and the certainty of success; the surety that her prayer was heard. She did not hesitate, or count perhaps all the obstacles before her, but that very day took measures to commence the rearing of silkworms. I cannot detail all that she said, nor half she enjoyed when, after six years of constant exertion, she saw her labors successful. In twelve years from the time when she began the rearing of silk-worms, she was left a widow, and found her husband's estate claimed by his creditors. Like too many of our merchants, he had enjoyed more than he owned, and his widow and children had nothing but their own skill to depend on for support.

Mrs. Lord did not shrink under this reverse. She had enjoyed good at the hand of God, and she knew her husband had striven to provide a competency for his family; but time and chance had deserted him at the very moment when his expectation seemed about to be realized. She did not despair, or complain, only for a short time, when the thought that she must be deprived of the privilege of assisting others; that all her gains from the silk manufacture, which she had always appropriated to charities, would now be needed in her own family; she had no other resource; in short, that for self only she must strive—she felt humbled, almost degraded by her own wants, and the narrow views and feelings she feared they would excite and nourish. But she had sown the good seed. A number of those whom she had formerly assisted, encouraged by her kindness and example, could support themselves; they were, in some instances, able to return her good offices. And her dear Emma, then a young lady beautiful and intelligent, at once applied herself to that occupation her suggestions had induced her mother to undertake. They have prospered beyond measure. The profits of their silk establishment supports them in competence, and they have still the luxury of indulging in benevolence.

"What should I have done? how should I have supported and educated my daughters, had I not obeyed the impulse which my Emma's prattle first awakened?" Mrs. Lord frequently says; sometimes adding emphatically, "we may learn wisdom of little children." Emma was lately married to a very excellent man, a merchant of Philadelphia; she will make an excellent wife, industrious and reasonable, as well as lovely and accomplished.

Mrs. Lord, and her three younger daughters are still busy with the cocoons, and are anticipating the pleasure of obtaining the sixty dollars, offered as the premium for the "greatest quantity of sewing-silk of the best quality" which shall be produced by one family.

Besides their own prosperity, Mrs. Lord has the sweet and proud satisfaction of knowing her example will have a beneficial effect on the manufactures and prosperity of her country. Who that reflects can be indifferent to the introduction of an art which will afford an easy, profitable, and healthy employment for our women and children, and that without any sacrifice of the domestic ties?

The following facts are selected from the "Silk-Culturist," a work published quarterly in New York, to which we refer our gay readers, who feel any wish to know the beginnings of that process by which their elegant attire was fabricated. And should our ladies engage in the experiment, just to see and learn the manners in which the worms grow and spin, they may dignify their employment by quoting royal, queenly examples. There is no sort of employment necessary to our support and human improvement but is respectable when honestly followed; but there is a choice in the labors necessity imposes, and I think school-keeping and cultivating silk, of all others, most eligible and agreeable to intelligent and delicate young women. None of our people are exempted from the chances of being liable to need exertion, and no one should neglect to prepare for the adverse day.

It is incumbent on all rich parents to teach their children some useful occupation, and young ladies should not deem their education complete till they know something by which they might at least support themselves. Now, having told my story, and moralized as is my wont, I proceed to the extracts which it will be very necessary to read in order to understand. The drift of a novel may be guessed at by its title, or the name of its author—but the writer that would teach rational and useful arts deserves a more attentive perusal.

"We place in view a sketch of the national and individual advantages which are contemplated and aimed at by the introduction of the culture of silk; these being well judged and estimated, it is certainly to be expected that a proper sense of patriotism, of personal interest, and of the instruction necessary, must at last surmount every difficulty.

"1. The article of silk added to the other pursuits of agriculture, the more enhances the value of land, that, by it, such parcels as are poor and waste can be profitably employed.

"2. Said produce or staple of standard value, according to its quality, is always exchangeable in commerce in all its several conditions, as it is neither perishable nor corruptible.

"3. It is a material for the manufacture of all kinds of filature, for raw silk, of machinery for weaving warping, for building a variety of looms, bringing into use every process of dyeing, &c., which business being divided and subdivided, affords numerous branches of mechanical industry, by which immense populations in Europe are now prosperously supported.

"4. Nurseries of silk-worms create also various branches of business among the poorer classes; the making of hurdles, frames, baskets, &c., gathering mulberry leaves and brushwood, detaching and cleaning cocoons, and many other sorts of employments incident on the management and completion of the culture, as if every individual of the poorest community could not fail reaping from it some advantage and benefit.

"This is certainly not an exaggerated exposition, and it would be a very easy task to embellish it, especially by representing its diffusion throughout a rational, industrious, and well-governed community; and instead of being superfluous, the smallest item advanced, each detail would be a delineation of innumerable sources of the prosperity of a large and powerful commonwealth; yet some inquiry might be urged respecting the specific benefit that could be depended upon as arising to each farmer's family from the culture of silk? To answer which, we should not separate the cares of a mulberry plantation from those of a silk nursery. A clear-headed industry can well unite both, and a farmer should be contented to supply his neighbors with a crop of mulberry leaves, when he could not use the whole of it himself: the same would not be useless if not called for, as it is an excellent fodder for cattle, or even a proper substance for rich manure. We may further show in succeeding pages, how an ordinary orchard planted with one hundred grown standard trees, on two acres of ground, can produce ten thousand pounds of foliage, the value of which would be equal to one hundred dollars; that, much less than that quantity is convertible into six hundred pounds of cocoons, worth at least three hundred dollars, which would engage the cares of his family no longer than forty days. However loosely these estimates are actually drawn, we aver that they will not vary much from our future tables, with other profitable matters which we cannot at present review. Suffice it to say, that the silk culture needs not many arguments to show its importance to the farmer; to realize which, it will now clearly be understood that there is no obstacle nor difficulty impending, unless it be the insufficiency or want of mulberry-trees, the propagation of which should be strenuously attended to."

"And in the next place, what is the result when the mulberry-tree is thus multiplied by public authority; or provided to every township at a small advance; or set out on commons and in plantations on certain liberal conditions?—Why, that there would scarcely be a family but might, for the sake of amusement, or for profit to be divided between the workers, or for pride in an agricultural pursuit, connected with a novel process of animal economy, patriotically enlist in the forty days' experiment, with the flattering prospect that the most successful would have the honor of bearing the palm from the neighborhood in the production of this valuable premium granted by Providence to human industry.

"We venture the assertion, and challenge refutation from experiment, that if each farmer in the county would devote a small portion of his farm to the growth of the mulberry, and allow his daughters to cultivate the silk-worm, in four years there would be a net profit to the county of $40,000, and in twenty years of $400,000, and without lessening at all the amount of agricultural productions at present raised."

POETRY.

TO DORA.—THE POWER OF LOVE.

Ort have I mocked the mystery of Love
As some fond fable of romantic minds,
A sickly dream, a hypochondriac type
Of girlish sensibility. I laughed
At the delusion, and defied its power.
I boasted, in the pride of moral strength,
That passion so enslaving ne'er could sway
A heart like mine, used to command the storms
Which wayward nature fosters, and to bend
Its stubborn longings to the rule of calm,
Unfettered reason.

Shall a mind
Filled with ambition's loftiest breathings, sink
Its mighty aspirations, and forget
The brightest visions of a beck'ning fame,
The triumphs of ascendant intellect,
Which hope is whisp'ring in the greedy ear;
Forego the glory of a laurelled name,
The homage of a world—and tamely sue
For the poor, paltry boon of beauty's smile,
The favor of a girl, a tender glance,
Perchance a faithless kiss, believed a pledge
Of true affection, but, in truth, a seal
Of youthful folly?

Shall we bind
The free, untrammelled spirit, wont to soar
Through all the realms of thought with eagle flight,
Culling from fancy's garden each bright flower,
And drinking draughts of joy from every fount
Of science, whether 'mid the starry host,
Borne high on airy pinions, it may scan
The wonders of creative energy,
Or, with an humbler flight, survey the scene
Of earthly bustle, gathering from them all
Food for reflection and improving thought?
Shall we enchain a spirit such as this?
With Cupid's slavish fetters bind it down
To worship at some pretty damsel's feet,
And say, the "world's well lost for love?"

'Twas thus
I rallied of love, disdained its very name.
Beauty to me was but a painted snare,
A gilded evil, which I wisely scorned;
And the deep passion of the lover's soul
A poet's fiction, which could only move
A smile of pity, or contemptuous sneer,
For the deluded youth whose insane heart
Could pine for such a shadow. I looked down
With high contempt upon the suitor train,
As a nerveless, doting, mindless race
Of passion's slaves.

But when I met thee, Dora,
Radiant as the seraph's loveliness, thy brow
Stamped on its spotless page with truth's own seal,
Thy bright eye kindling with the soul's warm fire
Of genius and pure sensibility,
And every feature beaming with the light
Of peerless beauty and ascendant mind—
470

The walls which years of cold misanthropy
Had built around my heart were broken down.
The magic of a glance, and the soft strain
Of angel music which those lips distilled,
Fell like a charm on my bewildered soul,
And all my senses, in Elysian dreams
Of joy enwrapped, did reel with ecstasy.
I felt the chain, as link by link 'twas forged,
And gloried in the bondage which it brought.
Meekly I kissed the sceptre, and rejoiced
To own myself no longer proudly free—
A slave of charms which angel hosts might wear,
Nor blush to own. Subdued, I bow to thee
In homage of such excellence. Nxb

TO THE MOCKING-BIRD.

BY N. B. MOORE.

How cheerless and gloomy the slow rolling year,
In the spot I inhabit, if thou wert not here,
My lone steps to brighten, my sad heart to cheer,
On the Isle of Orleans.

I gaze o'er the landscape, but nothing can spy
To arouse past emotions that long buried lie:
Naught resembles what once used to gladden my eye
In the Puritan land.

But thou hast a talisman, bird of the bower,
Unconscious thyself of its bliss-giving power,
To chase from my heart the dark clouds of that hour
On the Isle of Orleans.

'Tis thy magical note that transports me away
To the land of my birth, of my childhood, youth, ay,
And my manhood, just tasting the dawn of its day
In the Puritan land.

Polyphonous songster, now hid on the spray,
I would almost be sworn, if I knew not thy lay,
That blue-bird, wren, black-bird, thrush, robin, and jay,
Sparrow, woodpecker, swallow, hold concert to-day
On the Isle of Orleans.

The blue-bird's soft carol, how oft has my ear
Drank its sweetness in boyhood, when bounding in glee
O'er the pastures in spring-time, all happy and free,
In the Puritan land.

The trill of the black-bird, how quick it restores Rocks, mountains, lakes, rivers, Atlantic's stern shores,
To the vision of him who their absence deplores
On the Isle of Orleans!

The lays of the robin, though poured from thy throat,
Sweet forger of song, seem at least his own note,
For they bring in each cadence sweet scenes far remote
In the Puritan land.

Come, oh, come, then, sweet warbler, resume on the spray
Thy marvellous power; thy magical lay
Can alone from my heart chase its glooms far away:
Oh, sing! for I fain would be happy to-day
On the Isle of Orleans.

DEEDS OF LOVE.

"To enrich, and be thereby the richer."

BY BLANCHE BENNAÏEDE.

THE sunbeams pour their floods of light upon
The frozen ground, and thaw the ice and snow,
Which melt into the earth, and thus keep life
Within the root of tender plant and tree,
While Nature takes her annual repose
In stern old Winter's arms. Then comes young Spring
To waken up the buds, and bid them bloom
Again in beauty. Soon are seen the fruits
Of Summer, and her thousand beauties; while
From every grove and tree are heard sweet songs
Of praise, that thrill the heart of man with joy,
And bid him join in chorus. Autumn then Appears, with golden fruits abundant, which Are poured into the lap of Nature to Repay the sunshine and the shower, and man's Kind nurturing care.

And thus it is with things
Pertaining to the human heart. The more
We give its treasures shall we be thereby
Enriched, and reap abundant store of true
And lasting good.

A kind word gently spoken
To the sad soul when bowed to earth with grief,
Or deeds of charity unto the poor,
Will oft impart an untold pleasure to
The giver, which is sweeter far than all
That wealth can purchase with its coronets
And sparkling diamonds, and which lives
Throughout all time.

The gold may perish; but
The good deed never.

The oppressed will not Forget their benefactor, who has raised
For them his voice, and sought to bless them; nor Will Heaven forget. The orphan, too, who sighs
With sadness, will rejoice when love comes near,
And sweetly sing its praise: while she who weeps
In sorrow—the lone widow, who doth toll
Till midnight for a scanty pittance—will,
Upon her bended knees, thank Heaven, who heard
Her cry and sent relief. And will not He,
Who is all love, reward benevolence
And mercy, when His eye is over all
For good, and sleepeth not? Yes, verily;
The smiles of Heaven will ever rest upon
The form of Mercy, nor will deeds of love
Pass unrewarded.

Then pursue with zeal
Thy course, thou who dost visit poverty
And lend relief; or sittest near the sick
To pour the light of blessed truth into
The sinking soul, bidding it look beyond
Death's dark abode to an immortal life
In happiness celestial.

Words but fail
To show the worth of charity, or paint,
In truthful colors, her celestial form.
"More blessed 'tis to give than to receive,"
Said the divine and holy Teacher, who Spent all his days in doing good, and we May learn of Him. The suffering will rejoice
When gentle love comes nigh to wipe away
The falling tear; and those who minister
To others' happiness reap rich reward
Thereby, and lay up countless store of wealth.

TO CAROLINE.

BY ANN SWEET.

COME to me, love, at the moonlit hour,
When the fresh green leaf and smiling flower
So tranquilly sleep in the silvery rays—
Oh, come, and we'll talk of other days!

I will tell thee then how this heart of mine
Still lovingly turns to that blessed time,
Ere the cares and the fever of life came on,
And our hopes and our loves were ever one.

I will fasten a link in the riven chain,
And the severed wreath it may bind again,
To backward gaze, through a mist of tears,
On the faded joys of departed years.

We will go down the lane where the elm-trees are,
By the dear old well that bubbles there:
Sister of mine, have ye quite forgot
How we loved in childhood that darling spot?

And, further on, you remember, too,
A place where the daisies and strawberries grew?
Where the brown-bird floated from flower to flower,
And the nightingale sang at the twilight hour?

'Twas a beautiful spot when the sun grew low,
And bathed the whole scene in a brilliant glow,
While our favorite maple, so grand and bold,
He covered and decked with a crown of gold!

We will wander here in the moonlight sheen,
And I'll twine thee a wreath of the bright meadow-queen
We will almost think, in the calm, still even,
That the dream of your youth is yet unripen.

Ye will fancy ye see, in that vision fair,
The dear old vine-covered homestead there,
With its neat little parlor all cushioned in shade,
And tea-table spread with its cloth ready laid.

I love to think of that sunny time,
And forget that another home is thine;
That another roof-tree ye deem more fair,
And your household gods ye have gathered there.

Then come to me, love, at the moonlit hour,
For it hath a calm and subduing power;
'Twill ease the heart of its heavy pain,
And fasten a link in the riven chain.

SONNET.—CITIES OF THE PLAIN.

BY WM. ALEXANDER.

SLOW sinks behind the fated cities' hills
The sacred light, they ne'er should see again,
Which shone so oft in beauty o'er the plain,
Well watered by so many gushing rills.
High overhead his vengeful vial rears
The dread Death-angel of the wrathful Lord,
To give vile revellers their due award,
As onward the bold fire-flood now careers.
Down topple the altars, temples of their God,
That, erewhile, so magnificent had stood.
"Ten are not found," whom Heaven could deem as good;
All traces, then, where reckless sinners trod,
Death-bearing billows have for ever effaced.
Overwhelming cities "Shaddai had laid waste."

CLÄRCHEN'S PRAYER.

BY EDITH BRYANT.

And, in the deep stillness of the night, Clärchen prayed for Egmont, and because prayer would not save him, she died with him.

'Twas borne on the wings of Night,
A strange wild tone, and low
As the voice of a pleading seraph,
In its depths of anguished woe.

It came as the last sweet tone
From the strings of a broken lute—
Or a heart torn from its home,
In agony deep and mute.

It came as the last faint sigh
Of a worn-out heart at rest—
As the music, deep and wild,
From breaking harp-strings pressed.

It came as the prayer of the captive,
In supplication wild,
When Hope is fast departing
From Misery's worn child.

As the deep and anguished utterance
Of the strong man's agony,
When the passions within him are wild—
And all are at enmity:

As the heart which hath lost its mate,
When its kindred spirit's gone,
Bows low beneath the weight,
Like a broken reed in the storm:

So Clärchen's prayer arose
On the stillness of the night,
As the last breaking throes
Of a strong heart in its might.

CONSUMPTION'S WORK.

BY HELEN HAMILTON.

THEY tell me, oh! my gentle one,
That thou art dying, dying—
That human skill can naught avail
To check thy life's swift flying:
They say thou mayest hear, perchance,
Stern Winter's tempests rave—
But the early blossoms of the spring
Will bloom upon thy grave.

I brush away the burning tears
That dim my aching sight,
To gaze once more upon thy face,
So beautiful—so bright:
The rose has lent its fairest tints
To give thy cheek its dyes,
And the brightness of the diamond
Gleams in thine azure eyes.

But the rose's hue upon thy cheek
Is like the buds that bloom,
In sad and gentle loveliness,
O'er some lone woodland tomb:
And oh! it seems when I behold
The brightness of thine eyes,
As if they'd won the stars' soft light
By gazing on the skies.

I scarce can deem that thou wilt die,
Thou art so young, so fair;
But oh! thy very beauty bids
My yearning heart despair:
No hope! no hope! I dare not dream
Thou wilt be spared to bless
My heart and home a little while,
With thy seraph loveliness.

Beloved, farewell! Words cannot speak
The anguish of my heart,
For when thy gentle soul has fled,
My joys in life depart:
And then my only hope will be
That when life's span is o'er,
In thy fair heaven-home we'll meet,
We'll meet—to part no more.

THE WEDDING RING.

BY BEATA.

SWEET! hearken, while I tell the story
Of a quaint old wedding ring:
It seemed to me a world of glory
Circled round the hallowed thing.

Buried beneath the sod 'twas found,
Glittering, as in some casket rare:
How came it thus beneath the ground,
Unless a grave had once been there?

"Dear heart of mine, my love is thine,"
Was lettered on the inner side;
And fond eyes once did sweetly shine
Above those words, in joyous pride.

It seemed quite ancient, and would make
Of modern rings some two or more:
Would that I knew for whose dear sake
Was framed the motto which it bore!

Was it a young and tender wife
That, sorrowing, met her early doom?
Did he who lived but in her life
Choose in that quiet spot her tomb—

And locks of beauty, looks of love,
Shut sadly in the darksome earth,
And in life's pathway once more move,
Though life for him was nothing worth?

Or did he wander far away,
And die at last in some strange land,
Nor see again where Lucy lay,
With his memento on her hand?

This relic mute our thoughts may wake,
But cannot breathe one secret past;
But this unto my soul I take,
That love beyond the grave shall last:

That those who in their sunny youth
Together have the battle fought,
And walked in holiness and truth,
Together find the crown they sought.

Then, dearest! smile away thy tears:
"Dear love of mine, my heart is thine!"
Let us so live that no dark fears
Shall cloud thy happiness or mine.

MADELINE.

BY S. D. ANDERSON.

THY home was by the singing stream,
On which all golden shadows gleam,
Like sun and shade upon a dream,

When first I saw thee, Madeline:
No dove was purer, none so pure,
And love's rich font was deep and sure
Within a faith that must endure
Till life shall leave thee, Madeline.

Thou art a child of nature's choice,
It speaks within thy winning voice
In tones that make the heart rejoice,

When listening to thee, Madeline:
A simple, modest, guileless one,
Whose heart, like flowers beneath the sun,
Breathes out its richest gifts upon
The world's rude pathway, Madeline.

There is no form of wretchedness,
No care for Love to watch and bless
With its own rays of tenderness,
So pure and peaceful, Madeline,
But finds thee near with word and deed,
A friend amid the bitterest need,
To pour upon the hearts that bleed
A tide of comfort, Madeline.

A soul all quick to sympathize,
A nature truthful to those ties
That raise our wishes to the skies,
Are thine to fulness, Madeline—
Too high for nothing that may bring Peace in the shadow of its wing—
Something to which the poor can cling,
And find a shelter, Madeline.

A creature reaching to the stars,
Yet stooping to remove the bars
Of iron want, against which jars
The world's high-souled, Madeline—
Those beacon lights that shine along
Life's ocean-way, with beams as strong
As truth, when armed against the wrong,
Sheds from her altars, Madeline.

No duty but can bring to thee,
From thy full stores of purity,
A truthfulness and energy
As deep and lasting, Madeline,
As only those can feel and know
Who, like to thee, live in the glow
That love and charity bestow
On the true-hearted, Madeline.

Thou hast no taint of worldliness,
That downwards on high spirits press,
And crush the flowers of gentleness
Ere in their budding, Madeline;
That shut the heart in chill and drear
With clouds of doubtfulness and fear,
And turn to ice each gushing tear
For erring nature, Madeline.

A host of gentle memories,
Of deep forgivingness arise
Within the beaming of thine eyes,
That well with kindness, Madeline,

Outgiving all of love and truth,
Of modest prudence and ruth
That hope could fashion for a youth
Sunful of promise, Madeline.

From out the fountain of thy heart,
With impulse wild as archer's dart,
The streams of tenderness outstart
So bright and starlike, Madeline;
Upbearing on their mountain tide
Those whom the world has scourged and tried,
And deeply have their garments dyed
In bitter waters, Madeline.

But still thou canst, amid the wrong,
Hear murmurs of that spirit-song
With which that earnest-hearted throng
Claim kindred with thee, Madeline;
Can see their footprints on the shore,
Untouched amid the breakers' roar,
Firm as the souls who've gone before,
And pure as thine is, Madeline.

THE PEASANT'S SONG.

BY ANNIE.

MY cottage home! Oh, I would not dwell
In the crowded city for wealth untold.
Mine is a spot where the bright waves swell,
In the warm clear sunshine, like floods of gold;
The lofty trees in the free winds blow,
And the birds sing gayly as on they pass;
And sweet wild flowers like jewels grow
Down in the dewy grass.

The rose and jessamine climb the walls,
And in at the open casements peep;
The dry gray moss from the low roof falls,
O'er it a willow's long branches sweep.
In the wintry nights, when the winds rush by Like the strong deep tones of an organ vast,
They float with a melody clear and high
Out on the ringing blast.

I have a bower in a shady place,
Where the birds are singing the livelong day;
There the violet springs in its modest grace,
And the merry leaves with the sunbeams play:
From the trees above me the vines droop down
To the mossy carpet beneath my feet.
I would not envy a monarch's crown
Here on my woodland seat.

The woods around me, the dim old woods,
And a river rolling its bright waves past—
I could dwell in these eloquent solitudes
Till the heart which loves them has throbb'd its last.
Ye who are yoked to Pleasure's car,
And pour your idol-worship there,
Know there is happiness purer far
Out in the open air.

The flowers call from each fragrant bell,
And the tree-tops beckon and point on high:
Oh, come where freedom and gladness dwell—
Come to us under the broad blue sky,
And read and ponder each mystic line
In Nature's book that is open laid;
Come, worship God in the glorious shrine
Which His own hands have made.

GENIUS.

[Suggested by an incident which transpired at the Natural Bridge, in Virginia, as related by Mr. Elihu Burritt.]

BY MRS. M. A. BIGELOW.

'Twas mid-day o'er that mighty arch
Which Nature's hand hath framed,
And far beneath the Cedar Creek
Then in the sunlight flamed.

In the rough channel there below,
Three rosy children stood;
Uncovered was each thoughtful brow
Beside the sweeping flood.

Lo! now with earnest, curious eye,
They read, in letters deep,
Name after name, engraven high
Along the rocky steep.

At once they climb that jutting rock,
Which might the bravest dare,
And in rude letters carve their names
Deep in the limestone there.

They all descend again, save one—
One, with a dauntless eye,
Is reading far above his own
A name engraven high.

The name of one to Freedom dear,
Our Country's noble son—
"My humble name, I'll write it there,
By that of WASHINGTON."

'Tis done—yet upward, onward still
That boy pursues his flight,
Till from an opening o'er his head
Rushes a stronger light.

Many have gathered hastily
To see the hero there;
Anon he hears the voice of praise,
Or cry of faint despair.

But still he toils the vast ascent,
Beyond the reach of aid;
Still for his patient, tireless feet,
Niche after niche is made.

He pauses—turns a look beneath:
What arm can save him now?
A dizziness comes o'er his brain—
A paleness o'er his brow.

The father's hand a strong noose flings
From o'er the archway there:
A moment, and that slight form swings
Suspended in the air!

And now the parent clasps his child
With tones of transport loud—
While mingled shouts of rapture swell
From the assembled crowd.

Is it not thus with those who climb
The dangerous heights of Fame—
To write imperishably there
A name, an humble name?

Genius must never slack his course,
Or pause to look beneath;
One reckless glance at sordid things
May bring impending death:

Unless, thou venturous boy, like thine,
His Father's hand of love
Send succor from the arch of heaven,
And take his child above.

THE CANARY BIRD'S SONG TO ITS MISTRESS.

BY JESSIE LEE.

Oh! lady, bright as the silver light
Morn weaves, with rosy fingers,
Far upon high, in the azure sky,
Where the dusky shadow lingers:
Oh! list to me as I sing to thee
My tale of love and emotion,
And let me go where the waters flow,
To my isle in the distant ocean.

I have no need of the choicest seed,
Or of sparkling water ever;
Thou dost let the snow, when the cold winds blow,
Come to my bright cage never;
Thou dost look on me, in thy youthful glee,
With a pure and tender devotion;
Then let me go where the waters flow,
To my isle in the distant ocean.

With golden breast, on her downy nest
My mother sits repining—
And her mate's low song steals faint along,
Where the myrtle and rose are twining;
They cannot bear that—a stranger's care—
I should live in the land of another;
Oh! lady dear, pause as you hear,
And think of your own kind mother.

The soft winds blow, and the waters flow
So bright from the sparkling fountain—
And the dew-drops fall alike on all,
The bloom of the heather and mountain—
And the blossoms breathe on the quiet eve
Such a gush of untold sweetness:
Oh! let me fly to its genial sky,
And try my light wings' fleetness.

I should miss thy smile forever, while
The shade of twilight lingers;
I should never more pick my seedy store
From out thy snowy fingers;
Thy gentle form I should miss at morn,
Thy fond and tender caressing;
Yet, lady bright! let me go to-night,
With thy rich and holy blessing.

I cannot fly in the sunny sky—
These silver bars confine me;
From morning's light till dusky night
Thy silken fetters bind me:
Oh! let me go 'mid the gushing flow
Of my own deep quiet river,
Where the flowers bloom in sweet perfume
And the bright leaves dance and quiver.

I will send a prayer through the silent air,
To thy Father who dwells in Heaven,
If thou 'lt send me free o'er the foamy sea,
To my home, this quiet even;
I will tell my joy without alloy,
Thy holy and deep devotion,
And my mother will bless thy tenderness,
From her isle in the distant ocean.

MANDARIN SLEEVE AND COLLAR,
IN BRODERIE ANGLAISE.

Materials.—Fine book muslin, and W. Evans & Co.'s boar's-head sewing cotton, No. 50, and embroidery cotton, No. 60.

THE SLEEVE.

The sleeve, of which our pattern is given the full size, is made in the ordinary form of the mandarin. Seven scallops will be found sufficient for each.

The design consists of a deep-waved vandyke, worked in overcast stitch, and an inner vandyke, worked in the same manner. Five eyelet-holes, of graduated sizes, are placed between the vandykes of each scallop. These are made with a stiletto, and sewed round closely with Evans's boar's-head sewing cotton, No. 50. The embroidery cotton is to be used for the scallops, which are first to be traced, and then run with this cotton, until a raised surface is produced, to be afterwards covered with button-hole stitch.

The flower is made entirely of a group of eyelet-holes, sewed round like those in the vandyke. The stems to be sewed over, and the leaves worked with the embroidery cotton, in satin stitch, the veining down the centre of each being marked by working from the centre to the side, until you have come nearly to the point, when the stitches may be taken completely across the leaf.

The eyelet-holes above the sprays are made by piercing a small hole in the muslin, and working over it in button-hole stitch.

This kind of work should be firmly tacked on oil-cloth before it is begun.

THE COLLAR.

The collar may be done entirely in Broderie Anglaise; that is, by cutting out, or piercing holes in the form of the design, and simply sewing them closely over; or it may be made of muslin laid on net. In the latter case, the whole pattern must be traced in embroidery cotton, the stitches being taken closely, and through both the materials, and the sewing cotton must be used to sew it closely over. The muslin is then cut away from the ground, which is to be of net.

Whichever way the collar is worked, the edge must be sewed over, very neatly and closely, in button-hole stitch.

CLOAKS AND MANTLES.

No. 1.

NEVER was there a season in which there was so great a variety of graceful cloaks to choose from. Not the heavy, cumbrous garment that once enshrouded and hid all grace or outline in the female figure, but light, yet ample costumes, that answer every purpose of warmth for walking or driving. Travelling wraps, of course, are made of heavier and less elegant materials; a Rob Roy shawl being as comfortable and convenient as anything we could name.

We give two that are distinguished for elegance and comfort.

No. 1 is the Henri III. Manteau, a graceful style of cardinal, copied with historical accuracy. It may be made of any material—silk, satin, velvet, or even cashmere, or merino. When it is made of silk or satin, the trimming, as in the cut, consists of several rows of thick velvet ribbon, the same surrounding the pointed yoke, which gives an elegant slope to the shoulders. In broadcloth, a thick silk ribbon braid should be used. It will be noticed that most of the fulness comes in on the shoulders, making it less cumbersome than if it fell in the front or back. To be lined with white Florence silk.

No. 2 is the Alboni Cloak, of embroidered cloth, velvet, or cashmere. It is preferred by many, because no weight is sustained by the arm, a sleeve being constructed from the back breadth, which falls over the front in a line of waves or broad scallops. The embroidery is in braid and silk, the outline of the braid being followed up by a pattern of silk tendrils. The collar has also a trimming of the same. This will be found an exceedingly comfortable pattern, not crushing the sleeve and under-sleeve of the dress, which is the only objection to the cardinal style.

A new evening or opera cloak is called the Brettone, because it resembles so closely the form of the cloak worn by the peasant women of Brittany. It is something like the military wrap, with large, loose sleeves, which gentlemen wore a few years since. It may be made of any soft and warm material; but cashmere, of some light shade, is usually preferred. Gray, fawn, or light blue are the favorite colors; the lining should harmonize with it, and be slightly wadded and quilted. Pink and blue are also used for lining negative colors. The trimming may be of braid or lace gimp.

PATTERNS FOR SILK EMBROIDERY.

THE very beautiful design for silk embroidery which we give in the present number is a running pattern of convolvulus and leaves. It is suitable for sacques, dresses, cloaks—indeed, for almost anything to which embroidery can be applied. If wished in fancy colors, the leaves and tendrils should be of shaded greens, the stem of brown, and the blossom in purple or blue, shaded to imitate nature.

41*

The most fashionable style, however, is to have the embroidery in one color, matching the material on which it is used, or contrasting with it. For infants' sacques, cloaks, and dresses, no prettier trimming can be found. It is also used on plain-colored merino dresses, cloaks, and plain-colored silks, with good effect. The art can be acquired with little instruction, if any one has natural taste for ornamental needle-work—a branch of female industry never more in vogue than at present. In choosing embroidery silk, if a match to the material is required, it is better to have it a shade darker than even a half shade lighter; it should also be as fine and smooth as can well be selected, the best work looking badly with coarse materials.

KNITTED ARTIFICIAL FLOWERS.

WHITE GARDEN LILY.

Six petals, six stamen, one pistil, are required to form each flower; two knitting-needles, No. 19, and a skein of superfine white Shetland wool.

Cast on four stitches.

First row.—Slip one, purl two, knit one.

2d.—Make one, purl one, knit two, purl one.

3d.—Make one, knit one, purl two, knit two.

4th.—Make one, purl two, knit two, purl two.

5th.—Make one, knit two, purl two, knit two, purl one.

6th.—Make one, knit one, purl two, knit two, purl two, knit one.

7th.—Make one, purl one, knit two, and purl two alternately to the end of the row.

8th.—Make one, knit two, purl two—alternately to the end of the row.

9th.—Make one, purl two, knit two to the end of row; knit last stitch plain.

10th.—Make one, purl two, knit two to the end of row: purl the last stitch.

11th.—Make one, knit one, knit and purl two alternately to the end of row.

You will now have fourteen stitches, making seven ribs; continue these seven ribs until you have knitted a length of three inches from the beginning of the work. Break off the wool, leaving a bit long enough to thread a rug needle with; with this needle take up seven stitches, which you must fasten off; then the other seven, and fasten in the same way, which completes one petal. Take a piece of fine wire, sufficiently long to leave a small bit at the end for a stalk, and sew it neatly round the edge of the petal with white wool, which will make it in form.

PISTIL.

Cut a length of wire of about eight inches, fold a bit of green Berlin wool in six, and split in two another bit of the same wool; place this lengthwise with the other wool, and place the wire across the wool, fold the wire down, and twist it as tightly as possible, thus inclosing the wool; turn down the shortest end of the split wool, and twist the longest round it and the wire, so as to cover them evenly; fasten the wool with a slip knot at the end of the stem. Cut off a part of the green wool at the top, so as to leave merely a neat little tuft of wool at the end of the wire.

Stamens are made in the same way as the pistil, merely using yellow Berlin wool instead of green, and covering the stem with white instead of green. Place one stamen with every petal, twisting the wires of both together. The pistil is to be placed in the centre of the flowers when made up. Sew the petals together, leaving them open about an inch at the top, as neatly as possible, and draw them close at the bottom, twisting the stems together.

BUDS.

Several buds are required; the large ones are of a very pale shade of green, the smaller ones of rather deeper color. They look best in double knitting, and should be done in different sizes from twelve to twenty stitches. Knit about an inch of these different widths, and open them like a little bag. Take a piece of coarse wire, double some common wool about the thickness of your finger, put it across the wire, which must be folded down and twisted very tight; put this wool into the little bag, and gather the stitches of the bud at the top, catching the wire with your needle to fasten it. This will form the shape of the bud; fasten the stitches also at the bottom, and cover the stem with green wool split in two.

LEAVES.

Different shades and sizes are required. Begin them all at the top, casting on four stitches; they look best in double knitting, without putting the wool twice round the needle; increase one stitch every second or third row, till you have eight stitches for the smallest, and sixteen for the largest size. Continue to knit without increase, till the leaf is the required length. The longest should be about a finger length, the smaller in proportion. The longest must be placed at the bottom of the stem when making up.

To finish a leaf, pull your needle out, and thread a rug needle with the wool, and pass it through the stitches so as to form a little bag, into which you must insert a bit of double wire; catch this at the top or sides to fix it, and it will keep the leaf in shape. Draw the wool tight on while the stitches are threaded, and twist the wool at bottom round the little stem.

The next operation consists in mounting the branch. Begin at the top with the smallest bud, round the stem of which some green wire must be twisted. Fix it at the top of a piece of bonnet wire, the length required for the long stem; continue to twist the wool round, and thus fasten the second bud, and the rest in the same way, at very small intervals. The flowers are fastened in a similar manner, according to taste, adding the leaves as needed.

Six buds, three flowers, and eight or ten leaves, form a beautiful branch.

Although the petals of the lily can be made up with the wool as it is, they look much better if, after being knitted, they are washed with a little blue in the water, and quickly dried, before the wire is put round them.

EMBROIDERY.—NECK-TIE.

Materials—One-eighth yard of pink therry velvet, one skein of white embroidery chenille, one small reel of silver cord.

The leaves and flowers to be embroidered in chenille, and the veins and stems with the silver cord.

Trim round the ends with one row of chenille, in button-hole stitch, upon which work one row of double crotchet, in silver cord, with Penelope crotchet, No. 2. Finish, by lining with white silk.

EDITORS' TABLE.

"It lay upon its mother's breast, a thing Bright as a dew-drop when it first descends."

Mrs. WELBY.

THAT steadiness of purpose is necessary to the attainment of excellence in whatever we pursue, is never denied, not even by those who, judging from their actions, depend wholly on casualties for success. But still, this steadiness is mostly urged on men, as being necessary for them in their pursuit of fortune and struggle to gain distinction. Most people seem to think the ordinary business of life, especially the domestic duties committed to the woman, can be performed without much mind, plan, or perseverance.

And perhaps there is no employment pursued by reasoning beings with so little system or consistency, as the management of infants. Not only do different mothers have entirely different methods of training their children, but the same mother rarely pursues for a whole week the same method. One day she has leisure to pay constant attention to her child; the next, perhaps, "she turns it off," as the term is, as much as possible: this hour, its least murmur is hushed by kisses, and the next, it is suffered to cry unheeded.

It is mainly to this capriciousness of the mother or nurse, that the crossness of healthy children is to be attributed. The infant is first enervated by too much nursing, and then wearied by being too long neglected, and his uneasiness is made known by the only means in his power, which is to cry. And when he learns—and he soon learns—that tears and clamor draw the attention of his mother, he will cry till gratified by her presence; and every indulgence of passion makes him more irritable; till, finally, a habit of crying, or those periodical fits of crossness, which are usually attributed to every cause save the right one, namely, bad management, are engendered. Then the high temper of the little creature is to be subdued, often by harshness, when, had he been judiciously treated, that temper would neither have been kindled nor displayed.

But, with infant education, as with every other human duty, it is much easier to point out what is faulty than propose what will insure perfection. However, it is not among the least of our earthly blessings, that those rules of conduct which most effectually secure our own happiness, and that of those committed to our care, are usually simple and easy to be understood.

Divine goodness has thus provided the means for the greatest felicity of the greatest number; and, in studying what method we must pursue rightly to manage our little ones, no very elaborate system need be considered necessary. But one thing is necessary—it is that mothers be steady in their kindness, and uniform in their care; because sallies of passion, either of fondness or petulance, often indulged, are very injurious to the temper of their children. The mother who does not govern her own spirit does not, she cannot, manage well her child.

For the first three or four months of an infant's life, the feeble mind takes but little cognizance of the objects that surround it. Quietness, and rest on the bosom of the mother, are all that are then required to make the babe happy.

After that period, a healthy child cannot be easily managed without amusements, or employments rather—idleness is rarely the fault of children. Care should then be taken to furnish proper playthings; expensive toys are not necessary: a rattle, and blocks, balls, and little hammers of wood, are the best toys.

But they should never be painted, as a child always conveys whatever he has to his mouth. It is necessary that there should be a great variety in the size and form of the playthings, and they should be often changed, and the infant early accustomed to have one thing taken from his hand and another substituted. More depends on this seemingly trifling circumstance than those who never watched its operation are aware. A child thus habituated to the frequent change of his playthings will easily relinquish, and generally without noise or trouble, any forbidden thing which he may chance to have seized; an affair of no small moment to his own happiness, and the comfort of those who have the care of him. The tenacity with which many children retain their grasp of an object which they must not be permitted to have, and the grief they feel, to say nothing of the anger they frequently exhibit, when it is taken from them, are extremely painful to witness. The infant who has always been accustomed to frequent changes of his toys will seldom be thus troublesome. And a habit of yielding is also imperceptibly formed, and habits are so much more willingly obeyed than commands, that it is strange parents do not pay more attention to fix those of their children, in accordance with that obedience which it will soon be necessary to exact from them.

All causes of exciting restlessness by bodily irritation, such as tight or otherwise uncomfortable clothing, should be carefully avoided. Ease, neatness, and economy are all the fashions that need be consulted in infants' dresses. No female vanity is so reprehensible as that displayed by the woman who decks her little children in costly array. The teasing carefulness requisite to keep them from injuring their finery constantly interrupts their sports, disturbs their enjoyments, and not unfrequently makes them fretful, feverish, and wretched. And all this is done and suffered to gratify the mother's foolish vanity. Who can wonder at the vanity of her child's mind, thus early taught to prize show; or the perversity of its temper, made to sacrifice its innocent pleasures on the shrine of pride and caprice?

THE OPINION OF A PHYSICIAN.—An eminent English practitioner thus condemns the practice of exposing children to cold: "There can enter into the parent mind no more baneful idea than that of rendering children 'hardy' by exposing them unnecessarily to cold, and by clothing them inefficiently. I have known instances wherein parents, acting on this principle, have failed entirely in rearing their offspring. Does Nature treat her progeny thus? Does she not, first of all, insure the birth of her young only at a kindly season, and then provide them with downy coverings, warm nests, and assiduous protectors? And we must imitate nature, if we would give to Britain a race capable and worthy of maintaining her independence and honor. The little denizens of a warm nursery must not be subjected, without a carefully-assorted covering, to the piercing and relentless east or north-east wind; they must not be permitted to imbibe the seeds of that dreadful scourge of this climate—consumption—in their walks for exercise and health; they must be tended, as the future lords of the earth, with jealous care and judicious seal. One-sixth of the deaths of young children, it must be remembered, result from cold.

THE FUTURE.—Fifty years hence, the American nation will, probably, number one hundred millions of human beings; these, if rightly trained, will renovate the world: the training is woman's work; hence we learn the spiritual meaning of the great apostle's words: "God sent forth his Son, made of a woman."

FEMALE TEACHERS AT THE WEST.—In Iowa, there are five hundred and eighty-one public schools, taught by about the same number of teachers, of whom nearly half are females. In each township of the State, one square mile of land has been set apart to remain forever devoted to the support of public schools. The number of acres thus reserved in the whole State, is about one million, which, with other lands devoted to the same purpose, are now worth two and a half millions of dollars, increasing in value at the rate of at least ten per cent. every year.

A READING WORLD.—The statistics of the newspaper circulation in this country, on the first of June last, show that 2,800 papers were then in existence, having an aggregate circulation of five millions, and an annual issue of 422,600,000 sheets.

LIBERAL BEQUESTS.—The will of Mrs. Marianne Becker, of Bath, has just been proved, in which a sum of about £28,000 is bequeathed to various charitable and religious purposes. Among these, we notice: the Church Missionary Society, £3,000; the Church Pastoral Aid Society, £3,000; the Bible Society, £1,000; the Moravian Missions, £1,000.

It is assumed that, whatever evils are incident to the condition of American women, they have abundant means and influence to remedy, and therefore that there is no just ground for regarding them as resulting from any desire in one sex to oppress the other. On the contrary, it is believed that all just and generous men regret the inequalities of woman's lot as sincerely as any woman can do, and are quite as ready to contribute influence and means to remedy them. Any measures that American women may unite in regarding as essential to the welfare of their daughters, American fathers and brothers will be abundantly willing and able to provide.

The liberal contributions made by ladies of wealth to endow institutions for the other sex (not less than $50,000 in the last two years), and the many associations of women to aid in educating young men, are pledges of what may be expected in return.

THE FAVORITES OF FORTUNE.—The eighteenth century offers two examples of women who experienced extraordinary elevation. Louis XIV. renounced his pride of rank and aristocratic privileges in favor of Madame de Maintenon; and Peter the Great, with noble determination, recompensed the admirable courage of Catherine by sharing with her the imperial throne.

A SCULPTRESS.—We gave, in our June number, some notice of the young New England sculptress, who has lately attracted much attention. This lady, Miss Harriet Hosmer, who is only about twenty years of age, has just finished a piece of sculpture in marble which evinces talent of a high order, and promises to render her prominent as an artist. She calls the bust which she has completed, "Hesper, the Evening Star." It has the face of a lovely maiden, silently falling asleep with the sound of distant music. Her hair is gracefully arranged and intertwined with capules of the poppy. A star shines on her forehead, and under her breast lies the crescent moon. The conception of the subject of the whole work was her own, men having been employed only to chop off some of the large pieces of marble, as the work was in progress. The bust is exhibited in Boston. Miss Hosmer proposes to visit Rome for a few years, with the view of becoming a sculptor by profession.

THANKSGIVING DAY FOR 1852.—Thursday, November the 26th, will, we trust, be appointed as the day, by each and every Governor who holds sway in this wide sisterhood of States and Territories. What a grand spectacle to the world it will be! Nearly twenty-five millions of people sitting down, as it were, together to a feast of joy and thankfulness, and none pining in hunger throughout our Republic!

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "The Lesson Dream" (the September number was printed when the poem reached us), "Lines—In Memory of," &c., "The Electricity of the Heart," "Woman," "A Thought of the Gifted Dead," "Rain," "My Home," and "Stanzas."

The following are declined: "The Isle of Beauty," "To the Memory of Burns," "A Tale of Greece," "A Love Letter," "I Think of Thee," "He calls me Darling," "The Enchanting Spell," "We have been Friends together," "Adieu to Summer," "Little Children," "My Pen," "Blindness," "Moral Tales," "A Good Joke," and "Youth."

The "Odes of Horace" are not wanted at present. Our files are full.

The following letter to the literary editor points out an omission we would gladly have some gifted correspondent supply:—

"BALTIMORE, July 22, 1852.

"MRS. SARAH J. HALE.—MADAM: I have been a subscriber to the 'Lady's Book' these ten years, and, during the period, nearly every number contained some article illustrative of the history of the Puritans, but not a single contribution commemorative of the sufferings of the Huguenots. CAMIBARD."

OUR TREASURY. LIGHT LITERATURE

BY MISS ELISA COOK.

We live in an age of emancipation. The rules of thinking and acting which governed our grandfathers have no dominion over us. The introduction of steam has made life an almost perpetual motion. Thousands that for years had never strayed ten miles from their own home have been brought into full acquaintance "with the manners of many men and many cities." A steamboat, like Love, has wings, or at least has paddles, which answer the same purpose, and cut through space with equal celerity. The spread of energetic and universal excitement is visible in all directions. The impulse extends to all the social relations of life; friends living a hundred miles apart, and whose only communication was through the post-office, now start off by railway, after a leisurely breakfast, and are ensconced in the dining-room of their destination in good time for dinner. All this rapidity of movement is fertile in consequences. The value of time is calculated by infinittesimal quantities. We are made to see so clearly the quantity of business that may be dispatched in a given period, and how deeply the question of profit and loss may be effected by the loss of a few precious moments, that every cause of delay becomes a tax upon our patience. The adage that "what is deferred is not lost," is clean swept from the register of experience, as being unsuited, as in truth it is, to the new law of locomotion.

I do not purpose at present to investigate the good or the evil of this mighty revolution. It is of no use to philosophize; for, were I to wear down my pen to the stump, I should never make the world one whit the wiser. But there is one result of this law of progress well worth remarking. The race of deeply-read scholars is fast disappearing; I speak of that class which, in past times, consumed the midnight oil, readers who pored over the folios till sunrise, and whose incubations were said to smell of the lamp. Now, is there anything surprising in their disappearance? The descendants of these black-lettered bookworms are to be found now in the catalogue of les beaux esprits. A few hours on a railway will enable them to join their friends in a shooting-party on the moors; or, if they have a taste for foreign travel, a commodious and well-built steamer will speed them within sight of the Pyramids in less time than it would take to get through three octavo volumes. Who, having all this enjoyment in perspective, and a purse within reach of it, can be expected to sit down to hard study? Such self-sacrifice cannot reasonably be expected. We must be cast in a new mould before it can be looked for.

In every rank, and in every occupation, light literature has become the order of the day. In all that we do, and in all that we leave undone, the expenditure of time is taken into the account. Book-knowledge is slow of acquirement; the great demand is for that kind of knowledge which can be made available in the everyday business of life; which enlarges our field of observation, and keeps our faculties on the alert. In these days, our intellectual food must be easy of digestion, and must be served up like pancakes, hot and hot. Weekly journals, pamphlets, magazines, reviews, articles which have the cream of literature on the surface, and may be easily skimmed—these are the commodities in demand.

"Let us praise newspapers," says Dr. Johnson. "One of the principal amusements of the idler is to read the works of those minute historians, the writers of news, who, though contemptuously overlooked by the composers of bulky volumes, are yet necessary in a nation where much wealth produces much leisure, and one part of the people has nothing to do but observe the lives and fortunes of the other."

WOMAN'S PROFESSION.

BY MISS BEECHER.

THE only profession open to woman, corresponding to the three liberal professions for man, is that of an educator. All allow that this is exceeded in importance by neither of the professions of the other sex, and yet no such provision has been made for the liberal education of woman. It is impossible for her to secure such teachers and other advantages as colleges and professional schools offer, while the very inferior ones obtained in the first female seminaries often cost double or treble the expense of a college course. This heavy expense necessarily diminishes the time allowed by most parents for the education of their daughters.

The superior advantages provided for men enable them to compete with woman on very unequal terms, even in the sole liberal profession open to her. The best educated, of course, take precedence, and thus we see the posts of honor and emolument in education, even in the training of her own sex, to a wide extent, taken from woman and given to man. As a consequence, it follows that well-educated women, especially in the higher circles, have no elevating profession or aim in life to employ their highest powers.

To estimate the evil of this, imagine what would be the depressing influence on young men, if all the liberal professions, and all endowed institutions were taken from them, and they were confined to the pursuits that usually occupy well-educated women of the higher classes previous to marriage. If woman was trained for her profession as an educator, and held posts of honor and emolument open to her, she would be in the same position in regard to incentives to energetic and useful action as her brothers. To educate the human mind would be her business in life. When true affection calls her to the first relation in life, she would pursue her profession as a Mother; but, if not so called, she would be equally well employed as the educator of others, and find the stimulus of honorable employment, position, and emolument, just as her brothers do in their professions. Thus no woman would be tempted to profane the holiest relation by entering it as the only avenue to the full employment of her intellect and affections; and thus would the large class of educated women who are unemployed during those years that intervene between the close of school-days and marriage—the most effective years in the profession of an educator—become a rich blessing to their country and the world.

There is, besides, a large class of educated women who, though married, have no such domestic claims as would interfere with their being connected with female institutions as men are connected with colleges.

In the few cases in which women of superior energy and ability make for themselves posts of honor and emolument as principals of female institutions, how different their lot from that of the other sex in their higher positions as educators! The professors in colleges deem it an unreasonable exaction, if, after six or eight years' training in endowed institutions, they are required to teach more than two hours a day, while, at the same time, the responsibilities of the institution are so divided that no one is burdened. But woman, with a feeble constitution, after very inferior advantages to fit her for her duties, when she assumes the higher posts of her profession, becomes responsible to the public for the instruction of every pupil in every branch of female study, and all the details of government, finance, and the other responsibilities connected with such institution; and, in addition to all this, often teaches five or six hours a day. The result is the constant ruin of health to the finest female teachers, and the constant relinquishment of their posts to the more favored sex. The plea often urged for giving men the preference to women in the charge of the best female institutions rests solely on the fact that men have had better advantages of education provided at public expense, and that so much is required of female principals that not one in twenty can retain such a position without entire prostration.

In the professions of men, whatever is selected as so important as to demand public endowments, instantly becomes honorable. Crowds throng the favored path, even when it is seen that a great portion must fall entirely, and the majority gain only a moderate competency. Take away from the liberal professions all endowed institutions, and what a change would ensue!

The greatest evils incident to the lot of woman arise from the fact that her profession is not made honorable.

Literary Notices.

From THOMAS, COWPERTHWAIT & Co., Philadelphia:—
STUDIES ON SLAVERY, IN EASY LESSONS. Compiled into eight studies, and subdivided into short lessons for the convenience of readers. By John Fletcher, of Louisiana. Natches, published by Jackson Warner; Charleston, McCarter & Allen; New Orleans, John Ball; Philadelphia, Thomas, Cowperthwait & Co.

This is a very handsomely printed and durably bound volume, of more than six hundred pages. It is fully known to the readers of the "Lady's Book" how carefully we have always avoided all participation in the discussions which have taken place on the exciting subject to which this work particularly refers. Nevertheless, we feel free to present our views of a work, the object of which is, by arguments drawn from Scripture, and from other standard sources of authority, to defend an institution which has been admitted and tolerated within the constitutional law of the land. It must be recollected, however, that we speak only of the ingenious merits of the defense set up by the author, and not of the merits of the institution he has undertaken to defend; and therefore, without the least intention to flatter the author of these "Studies," and without committing ourselves either in favor or against his conclusions in regard to the question under consideration, we have no hesitation in saying that he has produced a learned and able work, and one which, if generally read, would at least throw oil upon the turbulent waves of sectional and sectarian controversy, and induce calm and sober reflection in the minds of all who are heartily interested in the cause of humanity, and in the permanent advancement and security of freedom. "Come, let us reason together," is an invitation which should never be rejected, and which, indeed, never can be rejected by the wise and the good. Whatever may be the effect of this book upon the public mind, it deserves consideration for its laborious researches into Scripture and antiquity, for its learning, for its candor, and for its style of composition. It will undoubtedly challenge the talents of the ablest opponents of the institution it defends, without forfeiting their respectful consideration of the author's sincerity, or for the force of his facts and deductions; and, whatever may be its other faults, in a literary point of view, it will be received, by all who read it, as an important contribution from the pen of an American writer.

From C. G. HENDERSON & Co., Philadelphia:—
GOOD AUNT FANNY'S BUDGET OF STORIES AND LEGENDS FOR CHILDREN. Translated from the German. Illustrated with fifty engravings. And first of these spirited pictures, which cannot fail of winning the eyes and hearts of children; they are from original drawings, and very fine. The stories are German in imagination, scenery, and moral; the belief in fairies and invisible agents is cherished there, and this amusing work is a curious study of human superstition.

From J. & J. L. GHON, No. 98 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia:—

HEROIC WOMEN OF HISTORY: comprising some of the most Remarkable Examples of Female Courage, Disinterestedness, and Self-Sacrifice of Ancient or Modern Times. By Henry C. Watson, author of the "Camp-Fires of the Revolution," "Sights in a Block-House," etc. This is a large octavo volume of four hundred pages, elegantly bound and illustrated. We have here upwards of fifty ably written sketches, embracing compilations of the lives and heroic virtues of the most eminent women who have left their examples and the impress of their characters upon the pages of history. The author has done good service for his countrywomen, in presenting them with a volume so full of interest, and so worthy of their study.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through LINDSAY & BLACKSTON, Philadelphia:—

MEMOIRS OF THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF THOMAS CHALMERS, D. D., LL. D. By his son-in-law, the Rev William Hanna, LL. D. This is the fourth and last volume of a work which, from the commencement to its close, has presented the pure life and the noble exertions of a Christian teacher, for the example, and, it may be hoped, for the edification of his brethren of the church of which he was a member.

ATLANTIC AND TRANSATLANTIC. Sketches Afloat and Ashore. By Captain Mackinnon, R. N., author of "Steam Warfare in the Parana." There is nothing very new or profound in the captain's narrative. We must say, however, that, unlike most English writers who have preceded him in their rapid travels and rapid commentaries on our country and the manners of our countrymen, he appears to have come among us with a disposition to be pleased, and was therefore generally successful in finding something which he could commend, or at least extenuate. There are many suggestions in the book which we might profit by, should we not be tempted, through national vanity, to reject their consideration.

CICERO'S TUSCAN DISPUTATIONS. With English Notes, Critical and Explanatory. By Charles Anthon, LL.D., Professor of the Greek and Latin Languages in Columbia College, Rector of the Grammar School, etc. etc. This clearly printed volume is another valuable addition to the classical literature of our country, made by a profound scholar and able and experienced teacher, whose laborious contributions have done more than those of any other individual to elevate the standard of collegiate education.

BISHOP BUTLER'S ANALOGY OF RELIGION, NATURAL AND REVEALED, TO THE CONSTITUTION AND COURSE OF NATURE. With an Analysis, left unfinished, by the late Robert Emory, D.D., President of Dickinson College. Completed and edited, with a Life of Bishop Butler, Notes, and Index, by G. B. Crooks. This able analysis, by an eminent American divine, of a learned work, which, for nearly a century past, has maintained the highest consideration among theologians, will at once commend itself to the attention of clerical students desirous of perfecting themselves in whatever relates to their sacred calling.

LIFE AND WORKS OF ROBERT BURNS. Edited by Robert Chambers. In four volumes. This is the third volume of the work, the first and second of which were noticed, as they deserved to be, as presenting the very best record of the life and writings of the bard that had ever been published.

From CHARLES SCRIBNER, New York, through A. HART, Philadelphia:—

DANIEL WEBSTER AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES. By Charles W. March. Fourth edition. The several editions through which this work has passed are the best evidences which could be adduced of its merits, and of the interest which the American public feel in all that relates to the political character and services of one of our most eminent statesmen.

ANGLO-AMERICAN LITERATURE AND MANNERS. From the French of Philiberte Charles, Professor in the College of France. Under the general head of "Origin and Progress of Literature and Eloquence in the United States," the author of this book has compiled three hundred pages of criticism, which may prove of service to authors and readers, and perhaps have a tendency to check our countrymen and countrywomen in their imitations of certain fashions and follies, not altogether consistent with our republican professions. Whether or not the author is a Frenchman, we shall not stop to inquire. It is enough to know that his facts are generally such as must be admitted by all, and that his remarks are such as may have a wholesome effect in the correction of national vanity.

VOICES OF NATURE TO HER FOSTER CHILD, THE SOUL OF MAN. A Series of Analogies between the Natural and the Spiritual World. By the author of "A Reel in a Bottle." Edited by the Rev. Henry T. Cheever. This is a beautiful Christian book, full of faith, hope, and charity, conveying the lessons of wisdom and purity in the language, we might almost say, of inspiration. It has been the great effort of the author to "trace some of the analogies, in the form and process of nature, between the natural and the spiritual world," and in this he has been eminently successful; mingling, as he does, the sweet but humble voices of nature with the sublime anthems of man's redemption, revealed through the spirit of Christianity.

PIONEER WOMEN OF THE WEST. By Mrs. Ellet, author of "The Women of the American Revolution," etc. The readers of the "Lady's Book" need not to be reminded of the patriotic labors of Mrs. Ellet, to preserve the records of female virtue, constancy, and heroism, which never shone brighter in the characters of women of any other clime, or of any other times, than in the mothers, wives, and daughters of the pioneer settlers of the American republic. Several of her contributions to the pages of our "Book" will be found in the present work, which, however, is intended to be an appropriate supplement to the memoirs of the "Women of the American Revolution," heretofore published. Mrs. E. very justly complains that a volume was published in 1861, entitled "Noble Deeds of American Women, with Biographical Sketches of some of the most Prominent," in which thirty-eight sketches, prepared entirely from original manuscripts—the subjects not even named in any other published work—were taken from her volumes of "The Women of the American Revolution," twenty-six of them being appropriated, in an abridged form, without the slightest acknowledgment. We hope the reading public will not overlook this fact.

From LEWIS COLBY, New York, through B. R. LOXLEY, No. 118 Arch Street, Philadelphia:—

AN OLIO OF DOMESTIC VERSES. By Emily Judeon. There are but few verses or sentiments in this volume that will not touch the heart of the poetical reader, and leave a lasting impression of the genius, the piety, the patient and motherly affection, and of the sufferings of the author.

From J. S. REDFIELD, Clinton Hall, New York, through W. B. ZENGE, Philadelphia:—

THE MEN OF THE TIMES; OR, SKETCHES OF LIVING NOTABLES. This is a valuable work for study and reference, and, from our knowledge of several of the "men" introduced, we should judge the sketches to be as just, impartial, and as free from religious or political prejudices as could be possible in a compilation of its kind. It embraces men of every class and profession, and of every country, who have rendered themselves conspicuous by their attainments, or by their acts, "in every department of exertion and every position of paramount importance." This book should be in the hands of every young man desirous of forming a just estimate of the public characters of men of his own or of other countries.

From P. DONAHOE, Boston, through T. LYNCH, No. 9 South Eighth Street, Philadelphia:—

A HISTORY OF THE IRISH SETTLERS IN NORTH AMERICA, from the Earliest Period to the Census of 1850. By Thomas D'Arcy M'Gee, author of the "Lives of Irish Writers." The author has presented some very fair and honorable specimens of his countrymen; but, as we think, has been rather unfortunate in his references to certain outbreaks, for which "restitution" has been made, and which might very properly have been permitted to "rest in peace."

From H. LONG & BROTHER, New York:—

THE LADIES' NEW BOOK OF COOKERY: a Practical System for Private Families in Town and Country; with Directions for Currying, and Arranging the Table for Parties, &c. Also, Preparations for Food for Invalids and for Children. By Sarah Josepha Hale. Here is a valuable book from the pen of a lady who has been nearly all her life engaged in practical labors for the benefit and the improvement of her sex. Her long association with the "Lady's Book" has fully established her literary reputation, in the attainment of which she has never forfeited, in a single instance, or in a single lot, the respect of the Christian, the moralist, or of the refined and educated lady. But, as no lady is thoroughly educated, more especially in this practical, republican country, who does not know how to manage her own household, and to direct all things thereunto pertaining, Mrs. Hale has added another contribution to the numerous presents she has made her countrywomen, in the shape of this neatly printed volume of nearly five hundred pages, replete, as it is, with receipts and matters of information, which, if not thought worthy of study, should always be at hand for ready reference. An advertisement on the cover of this number of the "Lady's Book" will give our readers a more accurate idea of the "New Book" than we have probably succeeded in presenting them with. Indeed, all that it was necessary for us to do was to assure them, as we do with the greatest confidence, that the "New Book" is the most complete of its kind ever published in America.

The "Literary World," of September 11th, says:—

"THE LADIES' NEW BOOK OF COOKERY. By Sarah Josepha Hale. Long & Brother.—A good practical book on excellent philosophical principles. One of these is the due preservation of the 'radical heat and the radical moisture' so much insisted upon by Uncle Toby in Flanders—in a just use of meats and sauces, according to scientific proportions, laid down in an excellent preface, entitled 'The Philosophy of Cookery.' Another is a conscientious care of the human race, beginning with childhood, a chapter being provided, 'an entirely new feature,' entitled 'Cookery for Children.' Then there is the eclectic principle.—'As our republic is made up from the people of all lands, so we have gathered the best receipts from the Domestic Economy of the different nations of the Old World.' France, of course, furnishes the largest quota; but the whole has been revised for American use, in which Mrs. Hale's tact and experience have been put to good account."

From GOULD & LINCOLN, Boston:—

THE ISLAND HOME. This work will be quite a treasure to every boy who is a boy, and who as such is fond of stirring tales of adventure. The story of the six young castaways, and the little native who was accidentally thrown among them, is told with vivacity and interest, not unmingled with humor. We only regret that the boys, who showed so bright a spirit through their dangers and deprivations, were not left at last safely lodged in their own homes. A better critic than ourselves, a boy who devoured the book almost at one sitting, pronounces it exceedingly interesting.

PLYMOUTH AND THE PILGRIMS, &c. By Joseph Banvard. To use the words of the preface, "The object of the present volume is to give a plain and correct account of the prominent events which have occurred in the history of Plymouth, the oldest colony in New England." It is a praiseworthy object to rescue from oblivion any facts connected with the eventful history of the stern, God-fearing fathers of our country, to keep before the eyes of the present generation, who, feeling "at ease in their possessions," may perhaps be inclined to seek too eagerly for wealth or worldly advancement, that they sprang from a race who, despising all more earthly good, willingly endured every possible deprivation and suffering, that they might "worship God according to the dictates of their consciences." The account of their labors, the disasters that impeded their early settlement, and their final success, are given clearly, concisely, and impartially; not even the great faults of their character, their bigotry, and severity, with the crimes which sprang out of them, being omitted.

NOVELTIES OF THE NEW WORLD, &c. By Joseph Banvard. This second volume of the Rev. Mr. Banvard's "Series of American Histories," is more general in its scope than the former. The events connected with the early discovery of America, and the adventures of the various persons who, at different times, were engaged in exploring it, or in vain attempts to colonize it, or Christianize the natives, are related with a minuteness and spirit that render the book an interesting one even to very young persons. The history is carried down only to the year 1680; but we have the promise of a continuation of the series, and we hope our expectations will not be disappointed.

YOUNG AMERICANS ABROAD; or, Vacation in Europe, &c. This interesting little volume is said, in the introduction, to be the work of three boys of the ages of twelve, fourteen, and sixteen, who, on a journey through several countries in Europe, under the charge of their instructor, kept a journal, and also wrote letters to a companion at home, which are here collected and published. The life and freshness that are thrown round the most hackneyed subject by the peculiar circumstances under which it is seen, make the descriptions seem almost new even to us, flooded as we have been, for the last ten or fifteen years, with "Travels in Europe." The account of the opening of the Crystal Palace, and of the whole exhibition, is very well told.

FROM JAMES MUNROE & Co., Boston and Cambridge:—
THE WORKS OF SHAKESPEARE, &c. By the Rev. H. N. Hudson, A. M. In eleven volumes. Vol. 5. We are glad to welcome another volume of this greatest of all dramatists, from the hands of a commentator at once so loving and so thoroughly acquainted with his subject. This number contains four of Shakspeare's historical plays, elucidated by ample notes and criticisms, showing delicate discrimination and a profound research into the manners and history of those times. New light is thrown upon many doubtful points, and the pleasure of the reader is greatly increased by feeling that all interpolations and alterations are decidedly rejected, and that the plays themselves are presented to us as they came from the great master's hand.

SIMMONS'S GREEK GIRL. A letter from London says: "Barry Cornwall has been pleased to express much approval of the 'Greek Girl,' a poem, by J. W. Simmons, Esq., of Texas. Douglass says the work has got the right stuff." We are glad to find this work appreciated by English critics.

NOVELS, SERIALS, PAMPHLETS, &c.

From Bunce & Brother, New York, through T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia: "Cecilia; or, the Memoirs of an Heiress." By Miss Burney, author of "Evelina," etc. Price 50 cents. This is one of the old English novels, but full of life, character, and incident.

From Long & Brothers, New York, through T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia: "The Guerrilla Chief; or, the Romance of War." Illustrated. Price 50 cents. This work is handsomely printed and embellished, but really we have had no time to examine it. The "Critic" and other British publications speak highly of its merits.

From Ticknor, Reed, & Fields, Boston, through W. P. Hazard, Philadelphia: "Lydia: a Woman's Book." By Mrs. Newton Croeland, author of "Partners for Life." This is a handsome reprint of a very popular English novel.

From J. S. Redfield, Clinton Hall, New York, through W. B. Zieber, Philadelphia: "The Master Builder; or, Life at a Trade." By David Kellogg Lee, author of "Summerfield; or, Life on a Farm." This is a highly interesting and instructive work, pure in morals and elevating in sentiment.—"Hagar: a Story of To-Day." By Alice Carey, author of "Clovernook; or, Recollections of our Neighborhood in the West," etc. A very agreeable story, in which the author has been very happy in her pictures of humble life, and, at the same time, sustaining a high standard of morality.

From T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia: "Mary Seaham." A Novel. By Mrs. Grey. The author of this work enjoys a wide reputation as a writer of fiction, having successively published not less than fourteen popular novels within an incredibly short period of time; not the least powerful in plot, incident, and truthfulness is the volume before us.

From Gould & Lincoln, Boston, through W. B. Zieber, Philadelphia: "Chambers's Pocket Miscellany." Vol. 5. Complete in itself. Price 20 cents.

From George P. Putnam, New York: Nos. 14 and 15 of "Putnam's Semi-Monthly Library for Travellers and the Fireside."—"The Arctic Journal; or, Eighteen Months in the Polar Regions." By Lieutenant S. Osborn. A very interesting narrative of a cruise in search of Sir John Franklin. Price 25 cents.—"Home and Social Philosophy." From "Household Words." By Charles Dickens. Second Series. Price 25 cents.—"Sicily: a Pilgrimage." By H. T. Tuckerman. Price 25 cents. This volume is uniform with "Putnam's Semi-Monthly Library for Travellers and the Fireside."

From Garrett & Co., New York: "Fair Rosamond; or, the Queen's Victim." By Pierce Egan, Esq. Complete in one volume. Price 50 cents.

From Lippincott, Grambo, & Co., Philadelphia: "Ivanhoe." From the last English edition, containing the author's latest corrections, notes, etc. A beautiful illustrated American edition for only twelve dollars, or at 50 cents each.

From Harper & Brothers, New York, through Lindsey & Blakiston, Philadelphia: "The School for Fathers." An old English story. By T. Gwynne.—"Anna Hammer: a Tale of Contemporary German Life." Translated from the German of Temme.—No. 27 of the "Pictorial Field Book of the Revolution."

Godey's Arm-Chair.

We must again mention to our fair subscribers that it is quite time to make us a remittance; the year is fast drawing to a close. While you are about it, you may as well also inclose the amount for another year, and make only one trouble of it. Trouble, did we say? Certainly it must be a pleasure to you to support a magazine entirely devoted to yourselves.

JESSICA.—This plate is from Shakspeare's play of the "Merchant of Venice," Act II. Shylock is saying to his daughter: "I am bld forth to supper, Jessica. Look to my home. I am right loath to go; there is some ill brewing towards my rest. For I did dream of money-bags to-night. But stop my house's ears—I mean my case-ments. Let not the sound of shallow foppery enter my sober house."

The beautiful cottage in this number is from the "Model Architect," by Samuel Sloan, Esq., published by E. S. Jones & Co., S. W. corner of Fourth and Race Streets, at 50 cents per number, containing several designs.

We give our usual four full-page plates, and the very latest, and, at the same time, the earliest patterns for winter cloaks, mantelets, &c.

A WHOLESOME AND SUBSTANTIAL COMPLIMENT.—"I inclose you five dollars, which should have been sent before. I always like to be punctual with the publishers, and particularly with one so deserving as yourself. I am pleased with the 'Lady's Book.' It has caused me to while away many a pleasant hour, not devoid of much useful information.
S. C. MCKEAN, Gen."

Thank you, good sir! Who else wants our autograph for framing?

BORROWERS.—We give the following letter from an editor. We have many complaints of the same kind. We have a remedy which we are about to propose to the press.

"I believe each number of your 'Book' is noticed. It may be sometimes overlooked, as it is hard work to keep it in the office long enough to look at the plates, and glance through its attractive letter-press. We are troubled with borrowers here, as are the craft elsewhere. It has long been my opinion that the 'Lady's Book' is at the head of the monthlies of Philadelphia, not only as a work for the ladies of the United States, but as a magazine of general literature.

F. M. P.,
Ed. 'Argus,' N. C."

"September 3, 1852.

REPENTANCE NOT TOO LATE.—"Mr. Godey, Sir: In a moment of uneasiness, I sent to stop my 'Book'; forgive me for it, and let the 'Book' continue.

"A. M. A."—The editress of the Fashion Department will procure the articles as soon as the new goods arrive.

"O. F. G."—Can get you an English edition with plates for $14. Presume the freight will be about $2.

488

Will P. A. McFadden, Esq., favor us with the name of the town and State to which his "Lady's Book" is forwarded? His letter, inclosing $3, is dated at Greenburgh, and post-marked Tarrytown; but we do not find his name at either place.

GODEY'S GALLERY OF ENGRAVINGS FOR FIFTY CENTS.—This is really the best opportunity ever offered of obtaining thirty splendid engravings at so cheap a rate, neatly done up; but they can be taken apart without injury, to place in scrap books. The "Greenville Patriot" says: "It is really splendid, and is a work which all who love to look at pretty pictures would do well to send for; and who is there that does not admire beauty in pictures as well as in nature?"

We ask attention to the advertisement of Mrs. Hale's "New Book of Cookery and Domestic Economy," published by H. Long & Brother, New York. A notice of the work will be found elsewhere. Any orders sent to the publisher of the "Lady's Book" will be filled on the following terms: He will furnish a copy in strong paper covers at $1, or in boards at $1 25, and in both cases pay the postage.

We call attention to Archer & Warner's advertisement on the cover of the "Lady's Book." They are very celebrated for their taste in getting up chandeliers, and in all matters pertaining to their business.

STEAMBOAT ACCIDENTS.—We are not about to refer to the recent and melancholy accidents, to call them by no harsher name, which have occurred on our Eastern and Western waters. It is too late now to make any comments that would be acceptable in soothing the afflictions of bereaved relatives, or in denunciation of those who should in all cases be held responsible. In order, however, to show the recklessness which is frequently displayed by men in highly important stations on board of steamboats, we may be permitted to introduce an anecdote related by a venerable clergyman. It fully illustrates the criminal conduct of persons in whose hands, for the time being, are placed the lives of hundreds, and even thousands of human beings.

Feeling somewhat anxious about the movements of the boat, the good man thought he would look into the engine-room, to see whether any person was in attendance; but what was his astonishment, instead of finding them attending to their duties, to discover two men engaged in playing a game of cards! At the same time, to his great horror, he heard a voice exclaiming that there was no water in the boilers! To which one of the card-players replied, with an oath, to his still greater horror, "Well, let her bust, if she can't stand fire till the game is up!"

STEAMBOATS ON THE DELAWARE.—Singularly in contrast with the above is the conduct of every person in charge, or in any way employed on board the steamboats running on the Delaware. The order and regularity observed on board the John Stevens, Captain Kester, for instance, when, as it sometimes happens, she is crowded with from one to two thousand passengers, is often the theme of admiration to many a grateful heart, conscious that wherever there is a full sense of moral responsibility, there must likewise be a more than usual amount of security from what are commonly considered accidents. The same security from danger is also felt by passengers on board the Trenton, Captain Hincle, and, indeed, on all the boats, and on all the lines of railroad belonging to the Camden and Amboy Company. This unbounded confidence is undoubtedly the result, in a very great measure, of the efficient and admirable regulations established and enforced by Wm. H. GATZMER, Esq., the principal agent of the company, and to the strict observance and execution of them by all persons in its employ: to all which, under a superintending Providence, must be attributed the grateful fact that but few accidents, and those comparatively trifling, have occurred on these lines in the course of many years, and during which many millions of travellers have been conveyed to and from New York and Philadelphia, and to and from the intermediate towns and cities.

"LIGHT READING."—The reading public is greatly indebted to the pens of learned commentators for the many serious lectures they receive, warning them of the evils attendant on the perusal of what has been termed, in a sort of general application, "light reading." We are certainly no apologists for bad books, or for such books or writings as would be likely to leave vicious or immoral impressions on the minds of readers, and yet we have never been able to form any other idea of light literature than that which is presented by the contents of all such books as are vicious and immoral in their tendencies. At the same time, it is true that we have never seen a practical or an authoritative definition of the term, notwithstanding it is of such frequent use in written and oral criticisms, and although its application, right or wrong, seems to be considered a full passport for any literary pretender into the very sanctum sanctorum of the temple of wisdom.

If, however, it is intended that the term to which we now allude should include, indiscriminately, all the works of imagination written for popular amusement and instruction, we should be pleased to know where, in what age of the world, and with what authors, the expurgatory index would begin and end? The ideas that writers and readers should be confined to matters of fact; to mathematical and scientific investigations; to the discussion of abstract questions in morals, politics, or religion; to excavating the deepest depths of the earth; or to climbing the highest and most mysterious pinnacles of the heavens, would, if carried into practice, probably have effects more injurious to the human mind, and prove more fatal to human happiness than all the "simple tales," and all the light and even trashy reading that we hear so much about. The fact is, it was just in such works as are now condemned as light and trashy, that the greatest philosophers, theologians, and students of the sciences found all their entertainment, and all their purest relaxation from the mental labor incident to their more serious researches. "Æsop's Fables," the "Arabian Nights," and numerous other works of a similar character, were at one time the favorites of men of the most profound erudition, whose minds, in order to acquire new strength, were compelled to fall back upon the mental food of their childhood.

We hope, however, it will be remembered, and we repeat the sentiment in order that it may be remembered, that we are not the advocates of light or trashy literature, even if by that term we are to understand a species of literature distinguished from that which is positively immoral and positively irreligious. A domestic tale, portraying the manners of the times, and tending to afford a truthful and judicious contrast between the vices and virtues of every-day life, and sketches calculated to elevate and to refine the moral sensibilities, cannot be less acceptable to an intelligent people, even though they should not be adorned by the same beauties of style and language, than were those of Addison and his distinguished contemporaries, the founders of English classical literature. We ask, at least, that those who, for gain or for fame, are delving into all the mysteries of earth and heaven, will not look upon those who are taking notes of the practical workings of the human passions, impressed upon the present condition of society, as the enemies of either God or man.

LADIES WHO MUSK.—Did you ever travel in an omnibus on a rainy day, windows and doors closed, eight on a side, limited, of course, to six, and among that number two women covered with musk? "Drive," said a Frenchman, "let me come out of ze dore; I am suffocate! You 'ave vat you call one musty rat in ze omnibus. I 'ave no paraplu mais. I preface ze rain water to ze mauvais smell."

We heard a very good anecdote, lately, of a French tailor in New York. He had a woman in his employ, an excellent hand, to whom he gave six dollars a week; but she wanted her wages raised, and called upon the Frenchman for that purpose, when the following dialogue took place:—

"Sir, I want my wages raised."

"Ah, Sally, you want more l'argent? What for you want more? You 'ave every'ting ver' comfortable."

"Well, sir, the Dutchman over the way has offered me seven dollars."

"Ze Dutchman is one ombug, Sally! He no pay you. I tell you vat I do. I no give you more money, mais; if you will marry me, I will marry you. I no give you seven dollars, but I make you one wife." And he did.

A RICH ENDOWMENT.—We make the following extract from a new work:—

"'Good morrow to you, Mrs. Fogarty,' reaches a snuff-box to offer a pinch.

"'Then good morrow kindly, Judy; I hope I see you well this mornin'!"

"'So, Mrs. Fogarty, you married your daughter?"

"'I did, indeed, praise be to goodness!"

"'Did she get a good match?"

"'Faix, thin, 'tis herself that did. Didn't she get blind Darby Driscoll, on the Dyke, that makes more money than any three beggars in Cork?"

"'I 'm delighted to hear it, Mrs. Fogarty, I assure you. That the world may wond'her at the luck they 'll have! Did you give her any fortune?"

"'Any fortune, is it? Ah, thin, now, Judy, is it after insultin' me you 'd be? Sure you know in yer heart that a child of mine was never married without it. Didn't I give her the best side of Patrick Street, which, if well begged, is worth seven and sixpence a week!"

Some friends of ours in this city caught an old beggar once in a communicative mood, and asked him how much he made by his business. "Well, now, to tell you the truth, it's a bad square that won't yield five levies (62½ cents)," was his answer.

GETTING UP BEHIND.—Eliza Cook has very facetiously exemplified the philosophy of getting up behind. We regret that we have not the room at present to give her explanations in full. A sentence or two must suffice. Here they are, in Eliza's own words: "Some new project is announced, and is hailed as absurd. It can never work; it is ludicrous—impracticable—stupid—insane. But it is tried, and is found to work; it even works well. Instantly, all the deprecators make a rush at the identical project which they had been abusing, and now try to 'get up behind'—be it railways, or screw-ships, or electric telegraphs"—or, as we would beg leave to add, magazines. It is unfortunately the case, however, and it is greatly to be regretted, perhaps, that many of those deprecatory persons get up behind when it is too late to hold on, and they are consequently jostled off, not only to their own great disappointment, but to the disappointment of the public also. We see such things happen every day; and yet every day we find a fresh multitude preparing to take the places of those who have fallen off. Who will write out for us the philosophy of competition?

THE ENGLISH STAMP.—It is very much to be regretted that, generally speaking, so little attention and respect are paid to American genius and talent, until it receives the approbation and the stamp of merit from some one of the literary standards of the English metropolis. Numerous instances are continually presented to us of the great importance attached to an English "stamp," or literary passport, before an American author can have a candid hearing or generous welcome from the American public. We have one of these instances just now in point, and which, if it were not so ludicrously amusing as an evidence of imbecility, and of servility to foreign pretenders, might awaken in us feelings akin to anger, or at least to those of contempt. Looking over the pages of one of our Anglo-American magazines the other day, we came across an old acquaintance whom we recollected to have met before in the "Lady's Book," under the familiar appellation of "My Brother Tom." It is true that "Tom" had somewhat changed in appearance since we last saw him; but there was no mistake about his identity, for his sister, the late Patience Price, recognised him the moment she saw him, dressed up as he was in the pink of English fashion, and stamped as he was with the "lion and unicorn," by our good friends of the aforesaid popular magazine.

In honorable contrast with the above fact, we have the pleasure to state that a quarterly journal is now published in Edinburgh, Scotland, entitled the "Foreign Evangelical Review," which is composed wholly of articles selected from the American religious quarterlies, present and past, with the names of the authors.

ARTUR'S HOME GAZETTE.—We call the attention of our numerous readers to the prospectus of this valuable weekly paper, which will be found on our cover for this month. The public are so fully aware of the great literary, scientific, and moral and social merits of the "Home Gazette," that we feel our duty is performed when we refer to the advertisement, through which it will be ascertained that the price of subscription has been greatly reduced, as well as the price of postage, and that the paper continues to be all it ever has been.

BOSTON OLIVE BRANCH.—It gives us great pleasure to notice the correct taste, the increased literary spirit, and the entire practical usefulness manifested in the columns of this interesting family newspaper. Mrs. Denison, who presides over the ladies' department, is herself a most amiable lady, a writer of most excellent fancy, and, withal, a woman of great moral and intellectual energy. A writer of great terseness and acuteness of observation has lately made her appearance in the "Olive Branch," under the nom de plume of "Fanny Fern." Fanny has already secured thousands of admirers, and will probably be honored with as many more, if she minds her p's and q's, and does not become too much of a coquette.

ILLUSTRATED FAMILY FRIEND.—While in the humor, which we confess does not come over us as often as the merits of a number of our exchanges merit, we must not forget our friend of the "Illustrated Family Friend," published at Columbia, S. C., and edited by S. A. Godman, a gentleman of rare and acknowledged abilities. We sincerely congratulate our Southern friends on the fact that they have now established within their borders a number of excellent literary papers. Among them is the paper already mentioned, and Richards's "Southern Literary Gazette," published at Charleston, S. C. We say to all South, to whom these presents may come greeting, by all means patronize your own local papers first. This is a duty which you owe yourselves, and which, if you neglect, the consequences may be such as will fall heavily upon the second, and even upon the third innocent generation that may follow. But our advice is not to the South only. We recommend to the people everywhere to encourage their local papers first, and if, after that duty is performed, they choose to look further, let them do so with a clear conscience. Neither must our friends imagine that we intend to make any invidious distinctions in regard to the merits of our exchanges; had we the time and the room for the performance of such a task, we would gladly reciprocate with the whole fifteen hundred of them, the many acts of kindness and favorable consideration which they have from time to time lavished upon our work.

TO READ AN INSCRIPTION ON A SILVER COIN, which, by much wear, is become wholly obliterated: Put the poker in the fire, when red hot, place the coin upon it, and the inscription will plainly appear of a greenish hue, but will disappear as the coin cools.

SEALING-WAX may be taken out of table-covers by dissolving the spots with spirits of wine or naphtha. Apply the spirit with a camel's-hair pencil.

TO MAKE DUTCH BUTTER, dissolve two ounces of isinglass in a pint of water, with the peel of a lemon; add a pint of white wine, the juice of three lemons, and the yolks of eight eggs well beaten; sweeten to taste. Make it quite hot, but do not let it boil. Strain, and put into moulds.

POMADE, to prevent baldness, is made thus: Beef suet one ounce, tincture of cantharides one teaspoonful, oil of origanum and bergamot, of each ten drops. Melt the suet, and, when nearly cold, stir in the rest of the ingredients, until set.

THE covering for preserves used by the trade, instead of bladder, is made by brushing over sheets of paper, of the thickness and length required, with linseed oil which has been previously boiled. The sheets should be hung on a string, and be thoroughly dry before using. This material is also used for tulip-shades, and as a substitute for glass in workshops. It is perfectly water-proof.

TERRA COTTA.—The term "terre cotia" is applied to literally baked clay. The modern terra cotia is made by the mixture of pipe-clay, fine sand, and powdered potsherds. The clay thus produced is baked in the open air.

THE HOOP PETTICOAT was adopted in the reign of Queen Anne; the first was smuggled from France, where it was invented, and measured seven yards in circumference. The English ladies improved upon the fashion by increasing the size to nine yards.

THE LACE-MAKERS OF BELGIUM.

Now that lace is once more so fashionable in a lady's dress, taking the place of embroidered muslin, to a great extent, in undersleeves, caps, collars, etc., the following sketch of this ingenious manufacture will be full of interest to the members of our "Centre-Table Club." Nothing adds so much to a rich costume as fine lace, and it is better to have none, and be content with plain muslin flutings, rather than wear imitations:—

"Each of the lace-making towns of Belgium excels in the production of one particular description of lace: in other words, each has what is technically called its own point. The French word point, in the ordinary language of needle-work, signifies simply stitch; but, in the terminology of lace-making, the word is sometimes used to designate the pattern of the lace, and sometimes the ground of the lace itself. Hence the terms point de Bruxelles, point de Malines, point de Valenciennes, &c. In England, we distinguish by the name of point a peculiarly rich and curiously wrought lace, formerly very fashionable, but now scarcely ever worn, except in court costume. In this sort of lace, the pattern is, we believe, worked with the needle, after the ground has been made with the bobbins. In each town, there prevail certain modes of working, and certain patterns which have been transmitted from mother to daughter successively for several generations. Many of the lace-workers live and die in the same houses in which they were born; and most of them understand and practise only the stitches which their mothers and grandmothers worked before them. The consequence has been that certain points have become unchangeably fixed in particular towns or districts. Fashion has assigned to each its particular place and purpose; for example: the point de Malines (Mechlin lace) is used chiefly for trimming night-dresses, pillow-cases, coverlets, &c.: the point de Valenciennes (Valenciennes lace) is employed for ordinary wear or negligé; but the more rich and costly point de Bruxelles (Brussels lace) is reserved for bridal and ball-dresses, and for the robes of queens and courtly ladies.

"As the different sorts of lace, from the narrowest and plainest to the broadest and richest, are innumerable, so the division of labor among the lace-workers is infinite. In the towns of Belgium, there are as many different kinds of lace-workers as there are varieties of spiders in nature. It is not therefore surprising that, in the several departments of this branch of industry, there are as many technical terms and phrases as would make up a small dictionary. In their origin, these expressions were all Flemish; but French being the language now spoken in Belgium, they have been translated into French, and the designations applied to some of the principal classifications of the workwomen. Those who make only the ground are called Drocheuses. The design or pattern which adorns this ground is distinguished by the general term, 'The Flowers,' though it would be difficult to guess what flowers are intended to be portrayed by the fantastic arabesques of these lace-patterns. In Brussels, the ornaments or flowers are made separately, and afterwards worked into the lace-ground: in other places, the ground and the patterns are worked conjointly. The Platseuses are those who work the flowers separately; and the Frisseuses de point à l'aiguille work the figures and the ground together. The Strisqueuse is the worker who attaches the flowers to the ground. The Fineuse works her figures by piercing holes or cutting out pieces of the ground.

"The spinning of the fine thread used for lace-making in the Netherlands is an operation demanding so high a degree of minute care and vigilant attention, that it is impossible it can ever be taken from human hands by machinery. None but Belgian fingers are skilled in this art. The very finest sort of this thread is made in Brussels, in damp, under-ground cellars; for it is so extremely delicate, that it is liable to break by contact with the dry air above ground; and it is obtained in good condition only when made and kept in a humil subterraneous atmosphere. There are numbers of old Belgian thread-makers who, like spiders, have passed the best part of their lives spinning in cellars. This sort of occupation naturally has an injurious effect on the health, and therefore, to induce people to follow it, they are highly paid."

EQUESTRIAN GOSSIP.

We have often heard the question discussed, "What is the proper gait for a lady equestrian?" some careful papas and uncles maintaining that they should never venture from a walk or rack, others allowing the canter, but nearly all declaring a brisk trot to be unfeminine and ungraceful. What would the careful guardian do with a young English girl, who would not fear to "follow the hounds over hedge and ditch," or come home flushed with a quick canter through a driving rain?

For our own part, and we have had some little experience, we should think no lady ought to be confined to either gait, as, in a long ride, much less fatigue is experienced where a change from one to the other relieves both horse and rider. In giving lessons on the road, Mr. Craig—the well-known proprietor of the Philadelphia Riding School—advises his pupils never to canter over the stones of a city road, either for their own comfort or that of the horse. Long, level reaches of road invite to this swinging motion; hills, both in ascent and descent, should be walked over, as accidents so frequently occur from stumbling where the road is rutted, or otherwise uneven.

A trot is the most frequently discussed question of all. Being the natural gait of the horse, it is, of course, less fatiguing to him, and the rider who has practice will find it equally comfortable, particularly if rising gently in the saddle in regular time. This is admirably taught by Mr. Craig, who uses in his classes a small strap or band of leather for the right foot—the left being in the stirrup—upon which the right limb bears weight after the fashion of a lever, in riding, thus rendering it both pleasant and easy. We believe it is his own invention. It is a difficult gait to gain at first; but, by a few good lessons, the rider becomes fascinated with it, and rough country horses can be used who have never been broken into a canter, an object of some importance gained. Since it is designated as "the jockey trot," it has been called unladylike; but we do not see that it is so, save in the name, which would beter describe the motion if changed to "flying trot," such being the sensation to the rider.

Mr. Craig also teaches a military trot, which, to our thinking, is far less graceful and agreeable. We can heartily recommend his system, as the military evolutions which form a part of the regular course give a grace and security in managing a horse, in turning, wheeling, backing, etc., which cannot be acquired in any other practice.

NICE QUESTIONS IN DRESS

FLOUNCES, says a clever writer, are a nice question. We like them when they wave or flow, as in a very light material, mullin, or gauze, or barège, when a lady has no outline and no mass, but looks like a receding angel or "a dissolving view;" but we do not like them in a rich material, where they flap, or a stiff one, where they bristle, and where they break the flowing line of the petticoat, and throw light and shade where you don't expect them to exist. In short, we like a gown that can do without flounces, as Josephine liked a face that could do without whiskers; but, in either case, it must be a good one.

Some few of what are nowadays called mantillas, which are the cardinals and capucins of a century ago, are pleasing and blameless. A black velvet one, turned up with a broad, dull, black lace, like bright metal chased with dead, is very good; also when made of plain silk, black or light colored, with no other trimming than, in milliner's language, "the same." But too often these articles are merely made the vehicle for indulging in a weakness for fringe, gimp, and other such trumpery, with which they are overloaded. Armholes in them we particularly object to; the lady behind them looks as if she were sitting in the stocks for a public misdemeanor.

If a lady sports a shawl at all, and none but very falling shoulders should venture, we should recommend it to be always falling off or putting on, which produces pretty action, or she should wear it up one shoulder and down the other, or in some way drawn irregularly, so as to break the uniformity. One of the faults of the present style is, as every real artist knows, that it offers too few diagonal lines. Nothing is more picturesque than a line across the bust, like the broad ribbon of the garter across the graceful queen, or the loose girdle sloping to the hips, as in the costume of the early Plantagenets. On this very account, the long scarf shawl is as picturesque a thing as a lady can wear. With the broad pattern sweeping over one shoulder, and a narrow one, or none at all, on the other, it supplies the eye with that irregularity which drapery requires; while the slanting form, and colors of the border, lying carelessly round the figure, give that Eastern idea which every shawl more or less implies. What Oriental would ever wear one straight up and down, and uniform on both sides, as our ladies often do!

OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

IN answer to a "YOUNG MOTHER," we would advise a stone-colored cashmere cloak, if one for the city is required. For travelling or the country, cashmere de lège, or even fine flannel plaids, would be more serviceable. The embroidery silk is to be had at almost every trimming store in the city. The editor of the fashion department will at any time procure it for the subscribers of the "Book," living at a distance, as well as the worsteds or materials generally, referred to in our Work-Table Department, of which she has also the care.

The charge of such a music teacher as "S. L. B." would require is from twenty to thirty dollars per quarter. They are retained for style, generally speaking, and undertake pupils who are supposed to understand the rudiments of music, and have already some execution. There are many good teachers, not having the prestige of fashion, who charge less than this—from twelve to fifteen dollars.

We would recommend the first set of Herr's finger exercises to "FANNY." They are published by W. C. Peters, H. Peters, Fields & Co., Cincinnati. The first page and a half would do more towards forming the hand than many of the voluminous instruction books now in use. We do not recommend them as practice in reading, recollect, or the study of musical art; they are merely intended to give a light, clear touch, and grace and ease in scales and running passages. They were brought to our notice by Edward L. Walker, Esq., the best pianist of this city, who has also a large experience in teaching.

Scarcely any directions can be given to "MRS. E." with regard to choosing a black silk. Even silk merchants themselves do not always know, and recommend one that will fringe or crack through ignorance, rather than dishonesty. Black silks are more worn at the present time than for several years past, and are always a suitable and elegant dress for ladies in middle life.

We agree with "EMMA" that the care of the nails adds greatly to the beauty of the hand. The white spots she complains of are occasioned by injury, a blow, etc., and will gradually disappear at the end. The nails should be well brushed with soap and water, and, when quite dry, with lemon-juice, to be washed off again with clean water. Pare back the scarf skin at the root, but never cut it, or you will have nail springs, as they are called, an untidy, and sometimes very uncomfortable appendage to the root of the nail. It is said that a "run around" or felon may be avoided by scraping the outer skin of the nail quite rough with a fine penknife, as soon as the first symptom appears.

Oranges are not very plentiful in midwinter, but sometimes, when a dessert dish is required in dearth of other materials, housekeepers will find the following an excellent practical receipt: For orange jelly, take ten oranges and three lemons, peel three of the former as thinly as possible, put the peel in a stewpan, and squeeze over it the juice of all the oranges and lemons; then clarify half a pound of sugar, pour the juice and peel upon it, and boil up the whole; then strain the syrup, and add half an ounce of isinglass, previously dissolved in half a pint of water. Simmer two hours, then strain. This is always in season in our Southern climes.

Archery is still practised by ladies; so we are happy to decide the wager of "JESSIE LINCOLN" in her favor. There is quite a distinguished archery club in Philadelphia, having their anniversary fête in September, always a brilliant and exciting day.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

Having had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editor of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Bridal wardrobes, spring and autumn bonnets, dresses, jewelry, bridal cards, cake-boxes, envelopes, etc. etc., will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq., who will be responsible for the amount, and the early execution of commissions.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Levy's or Stewart's, bonnets from Miss Wharton's, jewelry from Bailey's, Warden's, Philadelphia, or Tiffany's, New York, if requested.

DESCRIPTION OF FASHION PLATE.

Fig. 1st.—Dress of rich stone-colored moire d'antique, made perfectly plain and high, with full muslin undersleeves gathered into a band at the wrist. Sacoque mantle of dark-green velvet, slightly wadded, and lined with white satin. The trimming consists of close bands of stone martin surrounding the neck like a Victorine, and forming a heavy cuff upon the sleeve. The novelty is more in the shape of the trimming than in the fur itself, that having been used for several winters past. Bonnet of rose-colored therry velvet, with blende borders and insertions between the casings. A drooping plume of white, varied with rose color, falls at the right side. Broad ribbon strings, tied in a bow beneath the chin.

Fig. 2d.—Travelling-dress of mode-colored pelisse or habit cloth, with a saque of the same. The trimming is a double row of inch-wide velvet ribbon down the front breadth, with frog-shaped buttons of the same. The cut of the saque is new, and very stylish, the sleeve, cuff, collar, lapets, and side-pockets being of graceful form, and trimmed simply with a row of velvet ribbon, to correspond with that upon the dress. The close beaver bonnet has also a blue, claret, or dark-green velvet cape and bands, to correspond with the style of the dress. There are bows of the same inside the brim. A loose travelling-cloak of plaid, cashmere, or merino may be added in travelling.

CHITCHAT ON PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR NOVEMBER.

"Eccentricity in dress," says a late number of the Moniteur de la Mode, "belongs only to two classes of society, the very high or the very low. The real lady is always the partisan of simplicity, by which we mean the absence of everything, in color and ornament, so showy as to offend the purest taste."

Which is about the most sensible criticism upon dresses that we have ever known the Parisian oracle to utter, and one our ladies would do well to remember. Gay colors and patterns, at this season of the year, are always predominant in the windows of the shops, and you will doubtless be told there is nothing else to be had. On the contrary, there are just as many plain merinos, cashmeres, and silks to be had as ever before; and "the partisan of simplicity" will not suffer herself to be deluded into an Albanian robe, or a disposition mouseline of many colors.

For instance, in silks, passing the gay plaids, stripes, and brocades you may be shown at Levy's, silks in patterns of fourteen or fifteen yards, including flounces, richer in material, and more delicate in shades of color, than any that have ever been imported before. There is one, for instance, a pearl-colored corded silk, almost as thick as uncut velvet, yet so soft that you can crush it in your hand, and smooth it again with no sign of a crease or a wrinkle. The flounces are bordered by a double band or stripe in raised satin, of the same shade, one upon the edge, about an inch in width, the other separated from it by the same distance of silk. This style is repeated in the various other plain shades we have reported as fashionable the present season; at once novel, striking, and delicate. Again, we have a rich black silk, the same quality, with flounces bordered by deep scallops, and in every scallop a small brocade bouquet in brilliant colors. This is too showy for a street dress, and is intended for dinner parties, receptions, etc. It is only suitable, moreover, for a middle-aged person, with a tall, showy figure. A young, short, or broad woman would appear ridiculously overloaded in such a dress.

Some of the plainer, or less expensive fall silks are in graduated stripes, shot or changeable fabrics being entirely out of vogue. Light silks will be worn as evening-dresses at small parties through the winter, with short undersleeves and chemisettes of embroidered muslin or lace. A low corsage will scarcely do for a dinner-dress, but is quite the style for evening. They are rarely becoming after the neck and throat have lost the first roundness of youth, unless shaded by lace, either a simple scarf of illusion or a richer cape of Mechlin, Valenciennes, or less costly point. There are some very pretty new styles, fitting closely round the throat, and descending in a fall just below the shoulder, like a berthe; a bow of pink or blue satin or Mantua ribbon at the throat, and another where the cape meets the edge of the corsage is worn with them. For a simple evening toilet at home, or for a small party, they may be made of illusion or thulle, with an edge of fine lace an inch or so in depth. A berthe of thulle, in the close folds of what used to be called a "Grecian waist," may be made to drape the corsage of a plain, low, cut silk, with very good effect.

For all kinds of dresses, flounces were never more used than at present, the fullness being one breadth more than the skirt; a very safe rule worth remembering, as a flounce too full or too scant is worse than none. On rich silks, three are usually worn, being slightly graduated in depth; or thin materials for evening-dresses, four or five are preferable, as the sloping line from the waist to the hem of the dress is not so abruptly broken, and the fittings in which they naturally fall float back together. The flounces of the present season have no heading save a cord of the same, or silk; if it be a thin material, the edges are bound in scallops, pinked, trimmed with narrow silk cord, or velvet and satin ribbon.

Pointed bodices, for thick silks and heavy materials, still continue to be worn, but are neither very long nor very sharp behind. A favorite corsage for cashmere or merino, introduced by Miss Wharton, has a pointed shoulder cape set in at the side seam, and growing very narrow as it curves into the point behind and before. On the shoulder, it curves in extremely narrow. This has an edge of thick silk braid, or velvet ribbon, half an inch in width. The sleeves of this dress, which we have seen made in cashmere de bête, are cut in points in something the same style as those worn the past season, gathered into bands at the wrist. But now they are simply laced across by velvet ribbon or thick braid, three-quarters of an inch apart; the first row encircles the bottom of the sleeve like a rim, making about the usual width of the pagoda or open sleeve. The undersleeve falls below this, and is also seen through the opening.

There is a new style of velvet ribbon, all of the varieties coming in every shade of color, to suit the infinite varieties of cashmeres and merinos. It is woven like a double Mantua ribbon, with a bar of cut velvet running across, not through it.

We have not left room to describe Miss Wharton's bonnets, which must be left for another number, as also new styles of furs, evening-dresses, etc. etc. FASHION.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK!

THE PIONEER MAGAZINE. NEW VOL., XLVI.

LITERARY AND PICTORIAL.

THE BOOK OF THE NATION AND ARTS UNION OF AMERICA!!

Immense increase of reading matter without reducing the number of full page Steel engravings.

It is useless for the publisher of GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK to make any great parade of what he intends to do. The work has been before the public for twenty-three years, and it is a well-known fact that the latter numbers of a year are always superior to the commencing ones, as he improves with the expense which each month brings him, seizing every new feature of the day and imparting it to his subscribers through the successive numbers of the book.

Nothing but real worth in a publication could be the cause of so prolonged an existence, especially in the literary world, where everything is so evanescent. Hundreds of magazines have been started, and, after a short life, have departed—while the "Lady's Book" alone stands triumphant, a proud monument reared by the Ladies of America as a testimony of their own worth.

Many persons, who seek no further than our title, presume that the "Lady's Book" is intended merely for the amusement of a class, and that it does not enter into the discussion of those more important questions connected with the realities and the duties of life which every well-informed woman, mother and daughter, should be acquainted with. But such is not the fact. It is now, as it has ever been, our constant care to combine, in the pages of the "Lady's Book," whatever is useful, whatever is elevating, whatever is pure, dignified, and virtuous in sentiment, with whatever may afford rational and innocent amusement.

The expense of one number of the "Lady's Book," including steel engravings and literary matter, paid for, not taken from English magazines, far exceeds that of any other magazine published in this country. We make no exception, and are willing to have the fact tested.

GODEY'S SPLENDID ENGRAVINGS ON STEEL.

Remember that Godey gives more than four times as many Steel Engravings monthly as any other Magazine.

It is the fashion with many magazines to announce in their advertisements, "Splendid Engravings, Fashion Plates," &c. What is the disappointment of the duped subscriber when he receives the numbers of a magazine thus advertised, to find all his splendid engravings dwindled down to paltry wood-cuts—as contemptible in design as in execution!

The publisher of the "Lady's Book" performs all he promises, and, as some of our exchanges are kind enough to say, "more than he promises." Each number of the "Lady's Book" contains at least

THREE ENGRAVINGS FROM STEEL PLATES, ENGRAVED BY THE BEST ARTISTS,

either in LINE, STIPPLE, or MEZZOTINT, and sometimes FOUR.

GODEY'S RELIABLE FASHION PLATES

are published monthly, and are considered the only really valuable fashion plates that are published. They have been the standard for over twenty-two years. In addition to the above, every month selections from the following are given, with simple directions that all may understand:—

Undoubted Receipts, Model Cottages, Model Cottage Furniture, Patterns for Window Curtains, Music, Crochet Work, Knitting, Netting, Patchwork, Crochet Flower Work, Hair Braiding, Ribbon Work, Chenille Work, Lace Collar Work Children's and Infant's Clothes, Capes, Caps, Chemisettes—in fine, everything that can interest a Lady will find its appropriate place in her own Book.

MUSIC BY STANLEY.

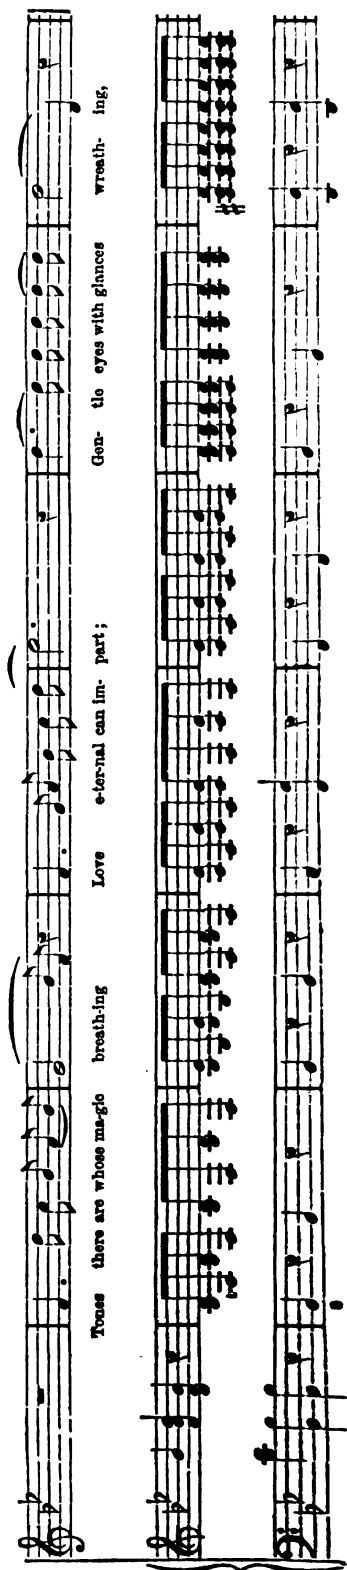

WRITTEN AND COMPOSED FOR GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK

Andante con Tenerenza.

PIANO.

Tones there are whose magic breathing Love e-ter-nal can im-part; Gen-tle eyes with glances wreath-ing,

Close as I, 'round the heart. Oh! how sweet are then earth's troubles!

With the balm of con- stan- cy,

Toll and care seem but as bub- bles On love's ev- er- last- ing sea.

2

But, alas! How sad, how mournful,
Should an adverse fate betide—
Should the tones so loved grow scornful,
And the lip be curled in pride;
For love's potent flames, now frightened,
Fiercely, madly, upward roll—
Hope's fond ivy moon is blighted,
And a serpent clasps the soul.

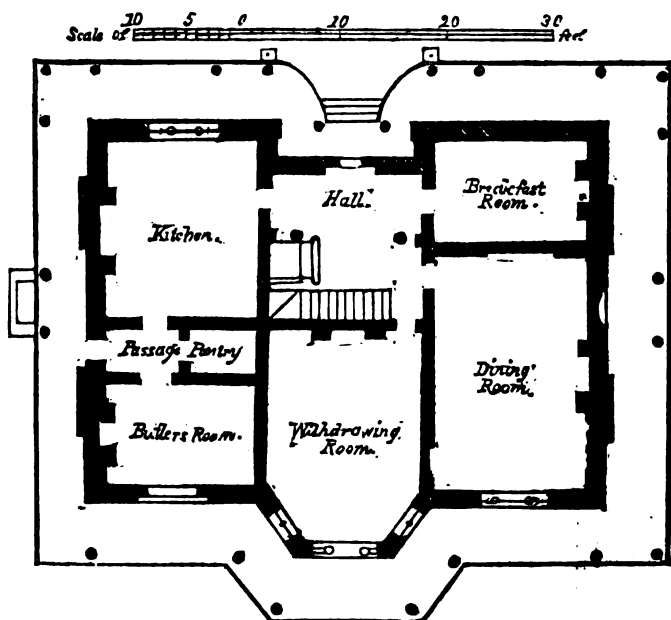

3

Wakened from our dream of heaven
By the buzz of coquetry,
When to all alike are given
Words of winning melody,
Then the pulse no longer quickens
'Neath that loved one's mocking eye:
But the heart grows faint and sick—
All it seeks for is to die.

THE BLIND PIPER.

BY JNO. B. DUFFEY.

(See Plate.)

Our piper is a blind old man—
Very little gold has he;
But there's no happier in our clan,
None richer can there be:
Since the bonnie lass that from his door
Her gray-haired grandfere leads,
For her winsome ways, is worth far more
Than the gold your rich man heeds.

Her smile is a sun to the darksome night
That 'round the poor man spreads;
His cabin is rich with the golden light
Her willing labor sheds:
Her handy toil has ordered well
Our blind old piper's store—
And comfort and peace, like sisters, dwell
In his lowly cabin door.

Our piper is a blind old man,
And a blind old man is he;
But there's none walks safer in our clan,
Though a blind old man he be:
For he feareth not the dissy chasm
When his Helen leads him o'er,
Though rocks the bridge with an awful spasm,
As the downward waters roar.

He cannot see the highland glade,
Where the deer drinks from the burn;
His eyes rest not in the green-wood shade,
But yet he does not mourn;
For the lakes are smooth in Helen's words,
And the hills are white with sheep,
And the valleys swarm with lowing herds,
And the mountain cascades leap.

Our piper is a blind old man—
No bookish lore has he;
Yet, of the learned ones in our clan,
None wiser can there be:
For his pipe it has a wondrous tongue,
That speaks to a Scotsman's heart;
The gully breast with its voice is wrung,
And sorrow robbed of its smart.

Its counsels shall live when he is dust
Who now awakens its strain,
And speak to man of the true and just—
Of freedom's holy reign.
The high, the noble, and the good—
All things that lift the soul—
Are taught in our piper's earnest mood,
And we yield to its control.

Our piper is both blind and old—
No fighting man is he;
But there's none in our clan that is so bold
Though weak and blind he be:
For foremost he stands on some lofty hill,
And he calls us to the fight;
We grasp the spear at his summons shrill,
And throng with a keen delight.

And his pipe is heard when battle shakes
The mountain-bedded rock—
And its voice each warrior's soul awakes,
To dare the coming shock.
And when the sword and the claymore ring,
Where our chieftain's plume we see,
Fired by its sound, with a shout we spring
To death or victory.

W O M A N.

Inscribed to Mrs. Hale.

Thy name is still the mystic spell
By which my heart is bound,
And every tale that hope can tell
Is mingled with that sound:

Could I but dream it in the grave,
A long sweet dream my heart would have;
And when the long, long sleep should end,
Its music with my spirit blend.

ILLUSTRIOUS CHARACTERS.

BY THOMAS WYATT, A. M.

(See Plate in August Number.)

MRS. ELIZABETH HAMILTON.

THIS venerable lady, now in the ninety-fifth year of her age, is the widow of General Alexander Hamilton, and the second daughter of General Schuyler of Albany, in the State of New York. Descended from one of the early Dutch settlers of this province, the influence and respectability of whose family had been transmitted through successive generations, her father exercised an almost unrivalled sway over the minds of the descendants of a people whose first mention in history, as a distinct political community, is associated with the assertion of their liberties.

General Schuyler married a Miss Van Rensselaer, by whom he acquired a large fortune, which, together with his own, made him one of the wealthiest men of that period.

Elizabeth Schuyler, the subject of this memoir, was born in Albany, in August, 1757. Her mother, who was an accomplished woman, superintended the education of her daughters till they required the assistance of masters. As Elizabeth approached womanhood, she bid fair to be very beautiful. Born and educated amid affluence and refinement, no pains or expense had been spared to embellish a mind susceptible of receiving every amiable and fascinating quality of character.

At the age of seventeen, Miss Schuyler was present at an entertainment given by the Colonial Governor at New York, where she was much admired. Here she first saw young Hamilton, who was then at college; he was nearly her own age, of elegant manners and superior education, which gave him an entrée into the best society of those days. At this time the colonies were beginning to show signs of discontent, and many severe remarks had appeared in the public press expressive of their grievances and oppression; these were believed to have emanated from the pen of young Hamilton, then a student at college, which caused him to be viewed with no small degree of interest. Colonel Troup says, "his talent for satire was frequently exercised; and the editor of a Whig paper, published in New York, had, by his zeal in the American cause, drawn upon himself the invectives of all the ministerial writers; these invectives, Hamilton burlesqued in doggerel rhyme with great wit and humor." As the term of his studies was drawing to a close, the repeated invasions of the rights of the colonies were increasing, giving an impulse to the public mind which could not be restrained. Consequently meetings were held, and resolutions framed, inveighing against the act of the government, exhorting the contemplated Congress to prohibit all commercial intercourse with Great Britain. It was at these meetings that Hamilton, only in his eighteenth year, took such a conspicuous part; he listened attentively to the successive speakers, and, finding several points untouched, presented himself to the assembled multitude. His biographer observes, "The novelty of the attempt, his youthful countenance, and his slender form, awakened curiosity and arrested attention. He proceeded almost unconsciously to utter his accustomed reflections; his mind warmed with the theme; his energies were recovered; and, after a discussion, clear, cogent, and novel, of the great principles involved in the controversy, he depicted in glowing colors the long-continued and long-endured oppressions of the mother country; he insisted on the duty of resistance, pointed to the means and certainty of success, and described the waves of rebellion sparkling with fire, and washing back on the shores of England the wrecks of her power, her wealth, and her glory. The breathless silence ceased as he closed; and the whispered murmur, 'It is a collegian! It is a collegian!' was lost in loud expressions of wonder and applause at the extraordinary eloquence of the young stranger."

Things were now growing worse, and Congress published a declaration to organize companies of militia: Hamilton joined a volunteer corps commanded by Major Fleming; this company was composed of young gentlemen of the city.

They assumed the name of "Hearts of Oak," and in their green uniforms and leather caps attracted the attention of the inhabitants.

Congress being still further determined to augment its military establishment, other companies were raised, when Hamilton was made "Captain of the Provincial Company of Artillery." This brought him into contact with the generals of the army, among whom was General Schuyler; who, witnessing the brilliant qualities of the young officer, made him more ready to grant the favor which was soon to be asked of him, the hand of his daughter. It was customary with the officers of the Revolution, when they entered their quarters either for the winter or for any length of time, to be joined by their wives. It was on this occasion that Mrs.

Schuyler, accompanied by her daughters, arrived at Washington's head-quarters at Morristown. Here Miss Schuyler again saw Captain Hamilton, recently appointed first aid to General Washington, who renewed his attentions to her, which ere long terminated in marriage. This period, fraught with the most exciting events, made a lasting impression on the mind of this daughter of the Revolution; the welfare of her country was near her heart, she felt deeply for the misguided Andre, and sympathized in the afflictions which had befallen the lovely wife of the traitor Arnold. In her correspondence with Captain Hamilton, she often made anxious inquiries as to the supposed result of this unhappy affair, which drew from him the following letter, illustrative of the earnest of his affectionate and generous nature; in which he says:—

"Arnold, hearing of the plot being detected, immediately fled to the enemy. I went in pursuit of him, but was much too late, and could hardly regret the disappointment, when on my return I saw an amiable woman, frantic with distress for the loss of a husband she tenderly loved—a traitor to his country and to his fame—a disgrace to his connections; it was the most affecting scene I was ever witness to. She, for a considerable time, entirely lost herself. The general went up to see her, and she upbraided him with being in a plot to murder her child. One moment she raved; another she melted into tears. Sometimes she pressed her infant to her bosom, and lamented its fate, occasioned by the imprudence of its father, in a manner that would have pierced insensibility itself. All the sweetness of beauty, all the loveliness of innocence, all the tenderness of a wife, and all the fondness of a mother, showed themselves in her appearance and conduct.

"We have every reason to believe that she was entirely unacquainted with the plan, and that the first intimation of it was when Arnold went to tell her he must banish himself from his country, and from her forever.

"This morning she is more composed. I paid her a visit, and endeavored to soothe her by every method in my power; though you may readily imagine she is not easily to be consoled.

"Added to her other distresses, she is very apprehensive the resentment of her country will fall upon her (who is only unfortunate) for the guilt of her husband. I have tried to persuade her that her fears are ill-founded, but she will not be convinced. She received us in bed, with every circumstance that would interest our sympathy; and her sufferings were so eloquent, that I wished myself her brother to have a right to become her defender. As it is, I have entreated her to enable me to give her proofs of my friendship. Could I forgive Arnold for sacrificing his honor, reputation, and duty, I could not forgive him for acting a part that must have forfeited the esteem of so fine a woman. At present, she almost forgets his crime in his misfortunes; and her horror at the guilt of the traitor is lost in her love of the man. But a virtuous mind cannot long esteem a base one; and time will make her despise, if it cannot make her hate."

This letter was received by Miss Schuyler about two months previous to her marriage, which took place at the residence of her father, in Albany, on the 14th of December, 1780. After the capture of Yorktown, in which Colonel Hamilton was signalized, he returned to Albany, but did not remain there long before he was elected to Congress, and after the evacuation of the city of New York by the British troops, he took up his residence there. In a peaceful simplicity, Mrs. Hamilton performed the duties of her station with exemplary care, manifesting great interest for her beloved and struggling country, at the same time cherishing that public spirit which so much distinguished the women of the Revolution.

She remained in New York until 1790, when Colonel Hamilton, having been appointed Secretary of the Treasury, removed his family to Philadelphia, where his station brought around him the exalted characters composing the early government. His house was the hospitable resort of all persons entitled to his regard. This was heightened by the kindness and cordial benevolence of his amiable lady—traits which time has not erased, but remain as a memento of that virtue which was the fascination of her visitors. On the retirement of General Hamilton from the Treasury Department, after a short visit to Albany, he again took up his residence in New York, where he passed the residue of a life too short for the welfare of his country. In July, 1804, General Hamilton fell by the hand of Aaron Burr, leaving a widow and seven children, the youngest about four years old. The cares of so young a family, which, upon the decease of her husband, devolved upon her, instead of oppressing, seemed to bring into fuller action the remarkable energies of her character. For, soon after that event, with the aid of some other ladies, she founded the orphan asylum of that city, and, until her removal from it, continued to be the "first directress" of that institution. Nothing was ever permitted by her to interrupt her cares of this interesting charity. Its appeals for aid were never made in vain; and she has lived to see it placed, through the munificence of a few benevolent benefactors, above merely casual resources. Until three years past, Mrs. Hamilton continued to reside in New York, when she removed to Washington, where she now lives. Her very advanced age, and her familiarity with the historical events and persons of this country, reaching back to its colonial condition, have rendered her the object of much public curiosity and interest, heightened by the character of her domestic relations and affinities. The portrait of any human being whose life embraces almost a century is an object of strong emotions; of one who has lived through such a century fixes the mind and the heart. It tells a tale of many joys and many sorrows, of a noble spirit equal to them all, and, as we pass from it, 'tis with a solemn regret that it tells also of one who, ere long, will only live the object of respectful and lasting remembrances.

MRS. ABIGAIL ADAMS.

In illustration of the character of this estimable woman, we must be permitted to transcribe a few remarks on her ancestry, written by her son, the Hon. John Quincy Adams.

"Abigail Adams was the daughter of William Smith, a minister of a Congregational church at Weymouth, in the colony of Massachusetts Bay; and of Elizabeth Quincy, a daughter of Col. John Quincy, the proprietor of Mount Wollaston. This beautiful spot, about seven miles from Boston, was settled by Thomas Wollaston and thirty of his associates in 1625, five years before that of the Massachusetts Colony. This settlement was broken up by Governor Winthrop, in the summer of 1630, shortly after his landing; and in 1634 was made part of Boston, and the land granted to William Coddington. This estate descended in a direct line till it became the property of William Smith, the father of Abigail Adams, and has been the residence and birthplace of the Adams family to the present day. Abigail Adams, the second daughter of William and Elizabeth Smith, was born on the 11th day of November, 1744. Her father, grandfather, and great-grandfather had all received their education at Harvard College. From this line of ancestry, it may justly be inferred that the family associations of Abigail Smith were from her infancy among those whose habits, feelings, and tastes are marked by the love and cultivation of literature and learning. The only learned profession in the first century of the settlement of New England was that of the clergy. At that time, lawyers were but little esteemed. Science was scarcely better cultivated by the practitioners of the medical art; but religion was esteemed among the most important of worldly concerns, and the controversial spirit with which it was taught, and which was at once the cause and effect of the Protestant Reformation, stimulated the thirst for learning, and sharpened the appetite for study and research.

"The founders of New England, and the settlers of Massachusetts Colony so well understood the dependence of practical morals upon religious principle, that, no sooner had they raised their sheds and piled their log-houses, before their thoughts turned to the erection of the edifice which should serve them and their children for the habitation of the mind. In 1638, John Harvard, himself one of the most distinguished of their ministers, bequeathed a sum of money for the establishment of a college for the education of ministers of the Gospel. This institution was soon raised and made, by the constitution of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, a university, bearing the name of its founder in glory from age to age, down to the extinction of time." At this time the Puritan fathers of New England considered female education to consist in the happy arrangement of their domestic concerns. The three daughters of Mr. Smith were therefore educated under his own roof, partly by his own instruction, with the occasional assistance of a teacher residing in the same colony. It has often been remarked that Mr. Smith and his family would have furnished ample materials for another Vicar of Wakefield. Mr. John Adams, an attorney-at-law residing in Braintree, became the admirer of Abigail Smith; but it was some time before the consent of her father could be obtained, he, as a strict Puritan, having conscientious scruples as to the honesty of the profession. At last, however, he consented, and they were married on the 25th of October, 1764, Miss Smith being in her twentieth year. Mr. Adams had been in the practice of the law about seven years before his marriage, and had made great advancement in his profession both as an orator and by his judicial talents.

The first year after his marriage he gave a fortunate stamp to his brilliant talents as counsel for an American seaman, who, in self-defence against a pressgang from his Majesty's ship in Boston Harbor, had killed the lieutenant of their party with the stroke of a harpoon. Mr. Adams proved that the usage of impressment had never extended to the colonies; and that the attempt to impress was unlawful; that the act of killing was justifiable homicide; the seaman was acquitted and discharged. This thrilling and talented address to the court, which lasted four hours, was considered of such importance that it was copied into the London newspapers, and received an extended circulation in the mother country; and, by the exertions of the young lawyer of Braintree, that brand of harsh servitude, stamped on the forehead of the British seaman, was banished from the code of colonial law.

The year 1765 will ever be remembered as the period when the most violent fermentation commenced, occasioned by the resistance of the people to the Stamp Act. Mr. Adams was the first who showed a determination of resistance, and often did he endeavor to prepare his young bride for the trials and sacrifices which he foresaw must occur, before his beloved country could be free from the monarchical shackles by which she was bound. For nearly ten years, Mr. Adams continued his practice of the law, with increasing reputation, till 1774, when he was called to the first Congress at Philadelphia. Mrs. Adams remained at Braintree with her children. In 1775, was the first deadly conflict. This took place at Lexington. Mr. Adams had left his home some days before, and his partner and her children were left exposed to continual dangers, and, as orders had been given to seize and imprison the members of the Continental Congress, Mrs. Adams expected hourly that her dwelling would be visited in search for her husband, and that she might be exposed to insult. She immediately packed the library of her husband, and the most valuable part of her furniture, and had it removed to a place of safety.

In the autumn of 1775, and during the absence of her husband, Mrs. Adams was called to pass through a severe affliction. An epidemic dysentery was raging; every member of her family was afflicted by it; and her mother, a brother of her husband, and a domestic in her family, were among its victims. In 1778, Mr. Adams was appointed a joint commissioner with Dr. Franklin at the court of France, and required to prepare for a hasty departure; but Mrs. Adams, having at this time four children, concluded to remain at Braintree with the then youngest—Mr. Adams taking with him his eldest son John Quincy, then about eleven years of age. Mr. Adams remained in France but one year, when he returned to the bosom of his family; but this happiness was to be but of short duration, for he had no sooner returned than he was commissioned to negotiate a peace with Great Britain.

Mrs. Adams again remained at home, and Mr. Adams took with him to England his two eldest sons John Quincy and Charles. In May, 1784, Mrs. Adams left Boston with her only daughter to join her husband, who on their arrival repaired with them to France, and took up their residence at the beautiful village of Auteuil. Here they resided rather more than a year, when Mr. Adams was commissioned as minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain. Mrs. Adams accompanied her husband and family to London, where they resided three years; and in 1778 she bid adieu to the turmoil of foreign courts to return to that country which was the joy of her heart.

During the four years Mrs. Adams spent in England and France, she was a minute observer of persons and things, and seldom allowed any event, however trifling, to escape her notes. Her letters to her friends, giving descriptions of passing scenes, were very interesting, and would even at this distant period be read with interest.

Many of them which appeared at that time were copied into the London and Paris journals, and commented on with general admiration.

In 1789, the government of the United States was organized, and Mr. Adams was elected the first Vice-President. The first Congress met in New York, where Mrs. Adams removed her family; but, after remaining there one year, it was removed to Philadelphia, where Mrs. Adams resided for nearly ten years. In 1797, Mr. Adams was elected President of the United States, the Congress still meeting in Philadelphia; but, during the first two years of his administration, it was removed to Washington, and Mrs. Adams with her family took up their residence there for the remainder of the term.

During all the changes and vicissitudes of her husband's political life, Mrs. Adams exercised all the virtues that adorn and dignify the Christian character. The freedom, ingenuousness, and plainness of her temper were known and admired by all who conversed with her. She was a lady of uncommon parts, ready thought, quick apprehension, and proper expression. In her letters, she used a great aptness and felicity of language, and, having a fine understanding, accompanied with a faithful and retentive memory, she soon accomplished whatever she was desirous to attain. She lived in the habitual practice of benevolence, and of sincere, unaffected piety. Mrs. Adams died of typhus fever on the 28th of October, 1818, at the age of seventy-four, leaving to her countrywomen the example of an obedient and devoted wife, a careful and tender mother, a gentle and benedict mistress, a good neighbor, and a true and constant friend.

THE LAND OF BEAUTY.

BY R. C. CRANE.

There is a land whose glories lie
Beyond the reach of mortal sight,
Save when strong faith's prevailing eye
Can pierce through earth's Cimmerian night,
And feel upon its visions lone
The shadows of the great white throne.

The founts of music gushing there
Flow not to this beclouded sphere,
Save when sweet hope in midnight prayer
May catch upon her listening ear,
Quickened by inspiration's fire,
The echoes from the seraph's lyre.

Untasted are the fruits that spring
'Neath summer skies and quenchless beams,
Save when deep love, on tireless wing,
May soar to drink from living streams,
And taste the fruits from trees that rise
To shade those streams of Paradise.

That land nor sin nor death can tread,
No orphan wanders there forlorn,
Or shivering brother begs for bread
To meet a gilded brother's scorn;
Too pure the living waters flow
To mirror aught of earthly woe

Thou land afar, my weary soul
Would quickly tread thy plains above,
Where sorrow's clouds can never roll,
And faith and hope are lost in love.
And this my tuneless harp shall be Made perfect through Eternity.

THE THREE CONQUESTS.

BY SARA.

"AND so, Julia, you are willing to leave your old father, and be the sunshine of another's home; is it so, darling?" said a gentleman to his daughter, in one of the pleasant homes of England.

"Oh no!" she replied; "I am not going yet, nor shall I ever leave you, father."

"But, my child, have you considered?—no, I need not ask; children do not consider—but you may reflect, at some future day, that your imprudence has brought you to poverty; poverty at least compared to the affluence which you might command. The fortune which I shall leave you is small; that of which Stanley has just come in possession is still smaller. True, he has a noble name; but that is of less consequence, when one is the younger son of a younger son. Why, my dear, if I must part with you, could you not fancy the noble Count Rothwell, who so recently asked me for you? He is certainly Stanley's equal in every respect, with a fortune sufficiently ample to satisfy even my wishes for your happiness."

"I am sure I don't know, father, why it is so," said Julia, with childish coquetterie; "and I am sorry that for once our views do not agree."

"Well, my dear, do as you please; but I cannot consent to an unconditional engagement on your part. If, at the termination of a year, you are still of the same mind, you may then"—and the father, too much excited by his subject to finish the sentence, left the daughter to her reflections.

Julia was sad. She saw that she had cast a shadow over the fond heart of her parent. Well might it grieve her spirit to give pain to one whose earnest care from her infancy had been that she should know no sorrow, nor ever feel the ills incident to her situation as a motherless child. Well had the aged oak shielded the tender plant that every day was twisting some new fibre around it, until they were so linked together that no shock of circumstances, and no storm of adversity, could rend them asunder. But the young cannot see with the eye of experience, and age can ill direct the young heart's first dream of love. Julia was brotherless and sisterless, as well as motherless. Stanley had been her playmate in childhood, and as a brother to her in her riper years. Their attachment had grown so imperceptibly that Julia did not attempt to check it, as she might have done, had she been conscious of the strength it was attaining, and the grief which it would cause her beloved parent. The time to crush the germ was passed, yet the plant could still be uprooted; but Julia feared that her happiness would be destroyed with it, and knew that her father would sooner give her to his enemy even, than see her unhappy. Besides, he had no serious objection to Stanley. He would hardly have thought any one deserving such a treasure, or been willing, but that he knew that he must pass away, to transfer to another the rich jewel in the crown of his old age.

Julia's brow, a brow hitherto placid as the bosom of a lake unruffled by a breeze, now wore the shade of troubled thought; but, on seeing her father resume his wonted cheerful aspect, the cloud which had hovered for a moment over her young heart passed quickly away, and, with spirits buoyant as the mountain air, she returned to her accustomed pleasures and duties; her duties to promote the happiness of all around her, from her doting father and devoted lover to her old nurse; and even Kitty and Rover had their share in her attentions: her pleasures to see every countenance beam upon her with gladness, and even the poor animals manifest their dumb joy in her presence. Rapidly, oh how rapidly on the wings of love and hope passed the gay hours of her bright, joyous existence; and lightly she heeded their flight, little reeking that the arrow was even now pointed which was so soon to be sheathed in her bosom. Stanley loved her truly, if the degree of love of which a selfish nature is capable may be called true affection. She did not dream that he was selfish and sordid, until she saw that he was dazzled by the wealth of one who possessed few attractions save those of rank and fortune. The thought, from the moment that it entered her mind, was a dagger to her peace, and she resolved at once that the moment her suspicions were confirmed, he should be free. She soon became convinced that, though he really preferred herself, yet were he released from his engagement he would seek the hand and the fortune of her rival. She did not parley with her affection, but wrote him immediately that, as the time had nearly arrived when their engagement was, on her part, to be either confirmed or dissolved, she hastened to inform him of a change which had taken place in her feelings; a change so great that she could consent no longer to remain under even a conditional engagement to him. She received a polite acknowledgment of her communication, containing some expressions of regret that the relation which had existed between them should be so suddenly terminated, and that he was no longer deemed worthy of her regard. He could say all this in the sincerity of his heart, for, but for the desire of riches, he greatly preferred the beloved companion of his childhood.

And now, having accomplished her purpose, and severed the tie which had so long bound them, Julia's feelings relaxed from the high tension to which they had been wrought, to the deep, death-like calm of despair. How gladly would she have relinquished the life which, but now, was all joyous, but which had become black as the pall spread over it by the memory of departed joys! But she thought of her father, and nerved her woman's heart to the stern conflict of life, when love, the life of life, was departed. This affectionate parent saw that it was only by a painful effort that she maintained a cheerful deportment in his presence; and, with the delicate perception of her feelings which a long and close study of her happiness had rendered more acute, left her to recover from the first pressure of the shock which she had sustained, free from the restraint of his presence. It was well that she was thus alone, for "there can be no companionship for loneliness of heart." When her spirit was thus overwhelmed within her, she turned to a precious relic of her departed mother, as the only expression of a mother's sympathy which she could now obtain. It was a Bible, which she had been accustomed to venerate and to read with her father daily. She now opened it with a vague feeling that she might find in it some relief to her overcharged spirit, and was surprised to find it replete with meaning which she had never before discovered. Its language of deep pathos so fully expressed her own heart-broken state, and its promises spoke so soothingly to her wounded spirit, that she found it indeed a support in the hour of her calamity. She then resolved that it should henceforth be, in a manner in which it had never yet been to her, the companion and guide of her youth. Youth—ah, that spring-time of the spirit was past forever!

The gay, light-hearted girl was gone, and in her place appeared the calm, thoughtful, subdued, yet dignified woman. It may be that the tender plant could no longer bear the full blaze of prosperity, and was now to be rendered healthful and vigorous by the pruning-knife of adversity.

Her father had studied her character closely, had marked her in every phase of her changeful mood, had analyzed every new development of mind or heart, and knew her better, at least in some respects, than she knew herself. He was therefore less surprised than she had been to find, on his return, her calm, serene bearing under this first visitation of sorrow. It is thus that one who has studied the mechanism of some noble bark sees but his anticipations realized when she rides majestically through the whirlwind and the storm.

Yet, in her solitude, Julia still felt the keenness of the pang they only know who have lavished upon an unworthy object the untold wealth of their affections. Such were the emotions of her soul, poured forth in a strain "To a Nightingale leaning on a Thorn"—

"For sympathy from human hearts my breast doth vainly yearn,
And now to thee, thou mourning one, my aching heart I turn.

A keener pang my bosom fills, a deeper fount is stirred;
Yet scorn I not thy lowly griefs, thou sweetly plaintive bird.

Like thine, my early joys with summer flowers are gone,
Like thine, my bosom leans on memory's piercing thorn;
But not, like thee, my soul with grief hath vainly striven,
Till, bowed to earth, I feel its chain can ne'er be riven.
In death thy bleeding heart shall soon forgetful be;
Mine feels a deeper wound from each struggle to be free.
But though the gift of peace shall sooner crown thy lot,
Since that alone is thine, the boon I envy not.
A deeper grief I bear, yet strength to me is given;
Not rest alone I seek, but perfect bliss in Heaven."

Julia became not misanthropic, but the power to discern character seemed to open upon her at once, so little had she before been accustomed to exercise it. Her father sought to divert her mind by journeying, the society of a few chosen friends, and the cultivation of her literary taste.

We will leave the aged parent, who should have leaned upon his child for comfort, endeavoring by every means in his power to restore to her the happiness so much dearer to him than his own, and turn our attention to the unhappy cause of all this suffering. Stanley had been encouraged by the wealthy belle, who was a heartless coquette, until one possessing, in her estimation, more desirable qualities presented himself. Stanley's attentions were then coldly rejected. He felt that this was but the just reward of the mercenary barter of his affections, and would gladly have returned to her who had ever been the object of his esteem and love. He finally so far overcame his mortification as to write her a frank confession of his error, and to beg her forgiveness and a restoration to her favor. But Julia, ere this, had completed the conquest of her affection for him, not merely by her earnest desire and continual struggle to do so, but in a manner in which she looked not for it. She had unconsciously become incapacitated for such an attachment as she had once cherished for Stanley. Her intellectual and spiritual growth had been so rapid, that he could no longer fill the place which he had once occupied in her heart. Yet she wrote him kindly, but firmly, that a change had passed over her which might never be reversed; that she felt no longer towards him as she once had done; nor could she ever feel for him more than the love which she was bound to extend to all her fellow-creatures. How beautifully has Mrs. Hemans expressed this state of the heart in her song!—

"If thou hast crushed a flower,
The root may not be blighted;
If thou hast quenched a lamp,
Once more it may be lighted;

But on thy harp, or on thy lute,
The string which thou hast broken,
Shall never in sweet sound again
Give to thy touch a token!"

Stanley sought not in his disappointment the consolation which had so wonderfully sustained the once fragile, but now strong spirit of Julia. But nature will seek happiness in some form: that in which Stanley now sought her was riches. For this he strove with an ardent worthy a nobler object, and he was successful—not in finding happiness, but in amassing wealth, to be in turn expended in the pursuit of happiness in another form, as vain and empty—that of worldly pleasures. So passed his life, rich in what thousands esteem capable of affording happiness, yet poor indeed in the more valuable riches of the mind and heart.

So passed not the life of Julia. Blest with a competency, she sighed not for riches, but, from her wisely expended means, supplied the necessities of her poor neighbors, sought their intellectual and spiritual good, was active and useful in a thousand ways, besides administering to the comfort of her beloved father, and enlivening the circle of choice spirits by which she was surrounded. True, she met with afflictions; but she who had so nobly conquered her feelings in the weakness of her almost childhood, was not, in the vigor of her riper years, overwhelmed by any subsequent shock of calamity. The bitterest cup which she drank was the loss of her father; yet was she comforted with the thought that he had but put off the frail tabernacle of the body, to enjoy more fully the blessings of spiritual life.

Her loss was, indeed, severe, yet calmly, serenely, though with a deeply chastened spirit, returned she to her duties, when the time which nature demands as the exclusive privilege of tears had passed away. And did she then forget him who had so loved her, whose life had been so closely linked with hers, that the subtle shaft of death alone could sever them? Forget him! let her careful observance of every wish he had expressed, the tear oft checked because he would have grieved to see her disconsolate, her efforts to be cheerful because he would have wished her to be so, and her continual looking forward to a reunion with him in the spiritual world, answer and bear witness how truly she loved and honored him even in his grave.

And now that she was left thus desolate, her former friend and admirer, Count Rothwell, hoped that she might look with more favor upon his long-tried affection; but his devoted attachment was to meet with yet another disappointment. Julia told him that he had ever possessed her friendship, which was still her only return for his generous affection. He replied that he did not expect such regard as she had once bestowed on another, but that he would sooner possess her esteem than another's love. Yet he could not induce her to reverse her decision, and reluctantly left her to the humble, retired life which she thus preferred to a life of splendor with one whom she highly esteemed, but could not regard with that emotion which she deemed essential to the sanctity of marriage. They who are dazzled by wealth and station might regard this as a splendid conquest; but a far higher than this, or the double conquest of Stanley, was that which she achieved over her own heart.

Surrounded by a few dear friends, Julia had leisure to devote herself with untiring assiduity to those ministrations of benevolence in which we may suppose angels joyfully mingle. Thus actively, yet unostentatiously, passed the remainder of her life; and she was happy; for as certainly as vice, however prospered for a time, brings misery at the last, so certainly does virtue, though it pass through the fire and floods of tribulation, ultimately bring peace to the soul.

LE MÉLANGE.

AMERICAN BEAUTY.

THERE are two points in which it is seldom equalled, never excelled—the classic chasteness and delicacy of the features, and the smallness and exquisite symmetry of the extremities. In the latter respect, particularly, the American ladies are singularly fortunate. I have seldom seen one, delicately brought up, who had not a fine hand. The feet are also generally very small and exquisitely moulded, particularly those of a Maryland girl; who, well aware of their attractiveness, has a thousand little coquettish ways of her own of temptingly exhibiting them. That in which the American women are most deficient is in roundness of figure. But it is a mistake to suppose that well rounded forms are not to be found in America. Whilst this is the characteristic of English beauty, it is not so prominent a feature in America. In New England, in the mountainous districts of Pennsylvania and Maryland, and in the central valley of Virginia, the female form is, generally speaking, as well rounded and developed as it is here; whilst a New England complexion is, in nine cases out of ten, a match for an English one. This, however, cannot be said of the American women as a class. They are, in a majority of cases, over-delicate and languid; a defect chiefly superinduced by their want of exercise. An English girl will go through as much exercise in a forenoon, without dreaming of fatigue, as an American will in a day, and be overcome by the exertion. It is also true that American is more evanescent than English beauty, particularly in the south, where it seems to fade ere it has well bloomed. But it is much more lasting in the north and north-east; a remark which will apply to the whole region north of the Potomac, and east of the lakes: and I have known instances of Philadelphia beauty as lovely and enduring as any that our own hardy climate can produce.—Mackay's Western World.

POISONS.

VESSELS of copper often give rise to poisoning. Though the metal undergoes but little change in a dry atmosphere, it is rusted if moisture be present, and its surface becomes covered with a green substance—carbonate or the protoxide of copper, a poisonous compound. It has sometimes happened that a mother has, for a want of knowledge, poisoned her family. Sourkrout, when permitted to stand some time in a copper vessel, has produced death in a few hours. Cooks sometimes permit pickles to remain in copper vessels, that they may acquire a rich green color, which they do by absorbing poison. Families have often been thrown into disease by eating such dainties, and may have died, in some instances, without suspecting the cause.—Dr. Thompson.

"I WILL."

We like that strong, robust expression. No one having uttered it sincerely was ever a mean, cringing man. The pigmies of the world did not trouble him. He speaks and the indomitable will prevail. His enemies fall before him. He rides forth a conqueror. Would you be great? Would you be distinguished for your literary or scientific efforts? Look not mournfully at your lot, but with "I will," breathing upon your lips, and bursting from a great heart, you cannot but prevail. Show us the man who never rose higher than a road-stool, and whose influence died with his breath, and we will point you to a cringing wretch, who trembled at the approach of a spider, and fainted beneath a thunder cloud. Let the fires of energy play through your veins, and if your thoughts are directed in the right channels, you will yet startle the slumbering universe.—John Neal.

WATER DRINKING.

PROFESSOR SILLIMAN closed a recent Smithsonian lecture, by giving the following sensible advice to young men: "If, therefore, you wish for a clear mind, strong muscles, and quiet nerves, and long life and power prolonged into old age, permit me to say, although I am not giving a temperance lecture, avoid all drinks but water, and mild infusions of that fluid; shun tobacco and opium, and everything else that disturbs the normal state of the system; rely upon nutritious food and mild diluent drinks of which water is the basis, and you will need nothing beyond these things except rest, and due moral regulation of all your powers, to give you long, happy, and useful lives, and a serene evening at the close."

HOW TO PROMOTE HEALTH.

Do not expect, sir, some wonderful announcement, some fascinating mystery! No. It is simply the plain little practice of leaving your bed-room window a little open at the top while sleeping, both in winter and summer. I do not come before you as a theorist or an inexperienced teacher, in thus calling loudly upon every family to adopt this healthful practice. I am the father of ten children, all in pure health, and have (thank God) never lost one, although their natural constitutions were not robust. But in addition to the salutary effect of the practice in my own family, wherever I have advised others to try its effects, it has invariably been found to be both pleasant and beneficial.—Correspondent of the London Sun.

THE HOMESTEAD.

HERE is what Thomas Jefferson said in a few words on this subject, a great many years ago. There is more necessity, now, for the new "declaration," than there was then:

"When the war is over, and our freedom won, the people must make a new declaration; they must declare the rights of man, the individual, sacred above all craft in priesthood or governments—they must at one blow put an end to all the trickeries of English law, which is garnered in the charnel of ages, binding the heart and will with lies. They must perpetuate republican truth, by making the homestead of every man a holy thing, which no law can touch, no juggle wrest from his wife and children. Until this is done, the revolution will have been fought in vain.

MANIA FOR OLD MASTERS.

BY HICKORY BROOM.

THE various crotchets which creep into the "heads of the people," upon as various subjects, afford much that is amusing, and more that is ridiculous. In the department of Fine Arts, the absurdities of taste are more openly displayed than in perhaps any other. Cunning men, acting on this fact, have, for a number of years back, been plundering the pockets of those unfortunate connoisseurs who have great faith in their own judgment, and greater in their worship of "old masters." This mania, which has been so prevalent, will doubtless disappear, now that it has become apparent that modern ingenuity has supplied what ancient industry had failed to do—viz., a constant stock of "old masters" for posterity. The absurdity of a taste for the "old masters" can be seen by a look at any of the private collections in the country, or on the walls of our academy. Such miserable daubs and ungainly drawings would disgrace the name of any living painter, however slight his calibre; and yet there are men who prate of their taste in the Fine Arts, and frown at the mention of a doubt of their judgment, who fall into ecstasies over a broken-backed saint, a disturbed virgin, or india-rubber-man Samson—the principal aim of old painters seeming to have been to endeavor to display the various contortions which the human body can undergo—and this accompanied with a peculiarity of color between brickdust and black ink, interspersed with occasional patches of white-wash. Notwithstanding these departures from all correct rules, the perverse "patron" of the Fine Arts sees much that is to admire, and freely bleeds at the pocket, to display to the public the fact that he can be humbugged into the purchase of an "old master," under the flattering idea that he is a "patron of the Arts." The enormous prices paid for this distinction are the more deplorable when we look around at the modern talent which, neglected and uncared for, is daily subject to the privations of the world—the emanations of whose genius would be a credit to the house and heart of any purchaser.

No ornament is more appropriate for the walls of a well-furnished house than the creations of the pencil (ancient daubs excepted), and our hope is, that the purchasing public will be drawn from the errors of their ways, in their senseless admiration of the "old masters," to a taste for nature and modern Art. The following nut we leave for all admirers of the particular class of paintings it has reference to, to crack. Speaking of the modern supply of "old masters," the "London Art Union" holds the following language: "The fabrication of false ancient masters has not always been the trade of needy dealers. A distinguished amateur of our own time, who moved in the best circles of society, and whose taste in the Fine Arts was patent to the highest classes, did not scruple to pursue the dishonorable course. The late Mr. Zachary, it may be recollected, occupied the house on the Adelphia Terrace, where the widow of David Garrick had formerly resided. Here he possessed some pictures by the great celebrities in art, which decorated the walls of his apartment, and occasionally appeared in the exhibition of the British Institution. In the back drawing-room, a stove was placed in the centre of the floor, having no connection with the chimney, for the express intention that the smoke should ascend into the room and circulate in every part. This stove was made from Mr. Zachary's design by Mr. Sandison, ironmonger, No. 7 Maiden-Lane, Covent Garden, and the accompanying sketch (see Engraving) will give an idea of its construction. On the ceiling iron rods were placed, to which the copies of his pictures were hung, resting obliquely on rails fixed lower down, as Mr. Zachary found by experience that the copies were best cooked into antiquity by remaining over the stove at an angle of 45°. Two poor artists were constantly employed by him in the house to make careful copies of his fine pictures. Three months was about the time necessary to harden and discolor the paint on these canvases, which then became similar enough, for deception, to old pictures. Mr. Zachary possessed a very fine picture by Hobbins, of which he had at least a dozen copies made, which were sent to various parts of Europe, where each may probably figure at present as the real original of a celebrated work by the great landscape painter of the Dutch school. Mr. Zachary did not confine his labors to making copies, but he undertook to improve originals. The pictures by Claude, known as the Berwick Claude, were once subjected to this operation. It had suffered by neglect and age, but now riots in more than pristine beauty, as it has received at Mr. Zachary's hands the addition of trees, which Claude did not think necessary to the composition. For three entire months an English landscape painter, formerly a Royal Academician, was employed to repair, beautify, and make additions to this Berwick Claude; which ended in Mr. Zachary's selling it for a considerable profit. Some other damaged originals of consequence underwent a similar revivification.

"Mr. Zachary sold his pictures twice by auction; it remains for the possessors of pictures which have once belonged to this gentleman to satisfy themselves that out of the numerous copies of his originals they may have acquired the fortunate prize, instead of a mystified blank."

It was decidedly cruel in the English picture-dealer to play upon the credulity of his "old master" customers. If their taste had made them fools, his avarice should not have been satisfied by making them dupes as well. We have very little pity for them. The humbug of picture-dealing does not stop at the old masters. Modern painters come in for their share in this wise: It is the habit of one or two gentlemen picture-dealers of this country to make pilgrimages to Europe for the purpose of procuring pictures by living artists, to satisfy the cravings of connoisseurs, and to fill a vacuum in their own pockets. After a few months' absence, they return with a large collection, which they hang up in a room selected for the purpose, calling on the public to take a gratis look. Various names well known to fame are given as the artists, and many of the pictures are transferred to the walls of private residences. Those not sold at private sale after a certain time are put up at auction, and bring good prices. It would seem a mystery to the uninitiated how so many pictures by living artists could be procured, and sold at such a "sacrifice." But they will see how easily it can be managed when they know that these "pictures by living artists" are merely copies purchased from the students at the various academies in Europe for a mere song, some of them being really excellent copies, but they are nothing but copies after all. Original pictures, by old or living masters, are not easily obtained, and it is a very difficult matter to tell the real from the counterfeit. If any of our readers want good pictures for their parlors, let them commission such living American artists as Leutze, Rothermel, Williams, Hamilton, and others.

A THOUGHT OF THE GIFTED DEAD.

BY MRS. J. E. THOMAS.

Ah! never shall a golden thought,
A lofty aim be lost—
Though glorious thinkers yield to Death,
As Southern flowers to frost!

For God, whose seal the gifted bear,
Shall other souls inspire;
And other hearts and lips shall glow
With the undying fire.

A starry ray shall clasp and gild
Our sorrow-night so dim;
For holy lips shall fondly close
The grandly-opening hymn.

The hymn his peerless soul had learned.
'Mid bitter strife and tears,
Oh, ever shall its echo ring
Through all the coming years!

And to our aching hearts, the while,
Sweet memories shall cling;
Blest dreams of him who round our way
Did light and glory fling.

Sweet friends, that wall above the bier
Of high hopes shrouded thus,
Joy! joy! that for a little while
He trod life's path with us!

Joy! joy! that on our latest life
His impress shall remain;
Nor seek to part what God hath blent—
The proud joy and the pain.

OUR HOSTESS.

BY MRS. S. J. MEGAROCK.

I HAVE tasted of the stranger's cup, and slept beneath the stranger's roof, and ever felt a yearning for the bright atmosphere of home, save one pleasant summer that I spent at Summerdale House, with its kind hostess, Mrs. McNaully.

Never shall I forget the delight and admiration I experienced when, after the heat and fatigue of a day's journey, we entered the gate that led to the mansion. Magnificent old trees shaded the walks, and fragrant flowers grew along the borders. In the centre of the lawn a sparkling fountain escaped from the upturned beak of a snow-white swan. Statues, artificial mounds covered by flowers, and mimic grottos served to make more beautiful this very lovely spot. A broad circuitous path led from the gate to the dwelling, which was two stories high, and built of white stone. The windows were protected by green Venetian shutters; those of the upper story opened upon a veranda which was supported by white pillars; the ground beneath it was paved with squares of variegated marble, affording a cool and shady seat during the warmest portion of the day.

When we alighted from the carriage, Mrs. McNaully came forward to receive us. Her benevolent smile and affectionate greeting immediately won my heart; and after we had been conversing a short time, I felt as if it were impossible that until now we had been entire strangers to each other. Her dress spoke a language from the past that was quite refreshing in an age when fashion's whims are forever changing; her silvered hair was laid smoothly beneath a cap of snowy lawn; her dress was of rich brown satin, the sleeves of which but reached to her elbow; brown silk mitts partly concealed the lower portion of an arm that time had failed to rob of its whiteness; a kerchief of thin muslin was folded across her bust; a white linen apron, with capacious pockets, a ponderous bunch of keys, and high-heeled shoes with silver buckles, completed her unique costume. She was slightly below the medium height, her figure round and portly; but her face—ah! indeed, it were vain for me to attempt describing it. Though age had dimmed the eye that once was bright, and planted furrows upon the brow that, years gone by, was smooth as polished marble, there still shone within those eyes a light that cometh only from the heart, and there was an expression of kindness and benevolence upon that aged face that made it beautiful as an infant's smile, or the first blush on a maiden's cheek; yes, gladness and beautiful is a cheerful old age, for it telleth of a life well spent, and duties faithfully performed; it showeth that the storms of sorrow have been banished by the smiles of contentment and resignation. But I will say no more, for it would be impossible for me to impart to you the admiration and love our hostess excited in the heart of your humble servant.

The dressing-bell caused us to seek our chamber for the purpose of exchanging travel-soiled dresses for those of a thinner texture; but when we entered the chamber, I forgot my purpose, and paused to admire the simple elegance displayed in its arrangement. Cool matting covered the floor; the furniture was composed of white enamelled wood beautifully gilt and painted; the beds were dressed in the purest white; the hangings were of thin muslin trimmed with deep lace; the toilet-table was dressed in worked muslin trimmed with lace; above it, hung an oval-shaped mirror surrounded by a gilt frame; the embroidered window-curtains were looped back by sprigs of cedar; brilliant flowers filled vases upon the mantelpiece; and green pine boughs were placed within the nicely whitewashed fireplace.

We had just completed our toilet when we were summoned to tea; the windows on one side of the dining-room opened upon a blooming garden; the balmy breath of smiling flowers stealing in upon us made our repast taste most fragrantly delicious; the table linen was of snowy hue, and of the finest texture; the napkins were inclosed in mother-of-pearl rings, upon which were numbers by which each seat was designated; the golden-hued butter and snowy bread were very tempting, as were also the freshly gathered raspberries and rich cream. Every dish on the well-laden table was so tastefully arranged and nicely prepared that the most fastidious appetite could not have sighed for better.

After tea we joined a party of city friends (who were also staying at Summerdale) in a ramble. They led us through shady paths and over a rustic bridge into a little valley where a sparkling waterfall capered and murmured adown the side of a rock into a small stream as clear and bright as liquid silver. The many-hued flowers and clinging vines that hung from the rocks, the overhanging trees, and the music of the birds that dwelt amid their branches, gave a fairy-like charm to the spot. Upon the banks of the stream a party of ladies and gentlemen (from Summerdale) were engaged in fishing. We watched their sport until the moon's bright face peeped down upon us through the foliage, when they ceased to trouble the finny tribe, and returned with us to the house. We then adjourned to the music-room (which was a long apartment furnished with cane settees, a piano, harp, and violin), where, midst music and the merry dance, the hours passed fleetly by until eleven o'clock, when we all sought repose within our chambers.

The next morning a delicious breakfast awaited us, after which parties were formed for riding, boating, and fishing. We joined a boating party, and for two delightful hours skimmed o'er the surface of the sparkling waters in a beautiful skiff, that seemed as if made by some graceful water-spirit, it was so light and rapid in its movements. We stopped at a picturesque-looking island to gather wild flowers, and returned to Summerdale in time for lunch. The remaining hours of the morning were passed in conversation, music, and reading. Thus, with variation of amusements passed the fleet-winged days at Summerdale.

One morning, about a week after our arrival, not feeling very well, I declined joining my friends (who had determined upon a picnic in the woods), and purposed spending the day within my chamber; but Mrs. McNaully kindly volunteered to amuse me, and, after having given the necessary orders to her well-trained domestics, she accompanied me to what she called her "snuggery." Upon opening the door, we were greeted by the music of birds, and the joyous bark of a little dog who sprang from his soft bed in a nicely quilted basket, and capered joyfully around his mistress, who placed before him a nice roll and a bowl of milk, which his "dogship" most eagerly partook of. Some fresh water, clean gravel, sponge-cake, and chickweed sparkling with dew, were then given to the Canaries; the exotics that filled the veranda upon which the windows opened were next attended to; every withered leaf was gathered, and cool water sprinkled upon each plant; then it seemed as if, in gratitude for the kindness, they emitted greater fragrance than before. After all the pets had been cared for, and whilst Mrs. McNaully was preparing some sewing ere she sat down "for a chat," I amused myself examining the curiosities and paintings that adorned the room. There were several very superior crayon sketches that attracted my attention, but one in particular interested me exceedingly. It represented a very handsome man, in the prime of life, holding a beautiful child in his arms; the little one was shaking a rattle with one hand, whilst the other was twined in the dark curls of its father's hair; the expression of each face was extremely lifelike; altogether, it appeared to be a masterpiece of art.

"Dearest Mrs. McNaully," I exclaimed, "will you not relate me the history of this picture?"

"I know it must be an interesting one, my dear child," she replied; "there is no wondrous tale attached to it; the sketch was taken by myself, and represents two beings who were very dear to me. As their fates were closely linked with mine, I will relate you some of the chief incidents in my life."

Delighted with the prospect of an interesting story, I seated myself beside her, when she commenced the following relation:—

"I was the only child of a Scotch laird, whose patrimony, though moderate, was yet sufficient to gratify our unextravagant wants. My mother died when I had reached my sixth year. Unfit to take charge of one so young, my father solicited a distant relative to make his house her home, and undertake the entire direction of my education. She accepted his offer, and proved well worthy of the confidence reposed in her. Dear Miss Smiley!—methinks I see her now, with a sad yet kind expression upon her sweet face as she reproved me—but oh! how gently—for some of my many misdemeanors, or endeavored to implant in my youthful heart the principles that were to sustain and strengthen it through the trials of after years. How much have I to thank her for!

"Had she not endeavored to convince me of the necessity of performing my duty, whatever it might cost, and of drawing happiness and pleasure from the sweet influences of home, instead of seeking them abroad, I might now have been a wretchedly unhappy being; for, in my after experience, I have beheld woman radiant in beauty, and wondered how she could so fearfully forget her mission upon earth. Endowed with the power to render home attractive, she fled from its quiet enjoyments to plunge into the vortex of fashion and dissipation, trampling in her progress upon the holiest and most precious feelings of the human heart. In vain bright childhood stretched forth its arms to win her back to joy. No, no! her ear had hearkened to the siren voice of flattery, and none other had music for it now. She had tasted of the glittering cup that pleasure proffers, and the fountain of love and sincerity was quaffed by her no more.

"All, all that renders life pure and sweet she turned from with disgust; the world had greeted her with its most winning smiles, and, like a charmed bird, she was won to destruction.

"And again have I beheld her, when fortune had bereft her of the glittering gems that made her so brilliant to the world. Relentless time, with un pitying hand, had robbed her of the charms with which nature had so profusely endowed her; the brightness that caused her to be a star amid the many had gone out like a lamp, leaving all in darkness around her, for she had treasured not the oil of love and charity within her heart, and had naught to give her consolation in the hours of her misery. Woman should never trust to the smiles and flattery of the world. They hover around her in the days of prosperity; but when the clouds of sorrow and adversity lower above her, they leave her unthought of, and uncared for in her despair. Thus we cannot be too grateful to those who implant in our childish hearts the seeds of humility, charity, and contentment, thus placing within our grasp a staff to guide our footsteps through the thorns and quicksands that beset the path of life.

"I had reached my eighteenth year when Miss Smiley was entreated to take charge of another pupil, as I was now capable of conducting my father's house, and prepared for studying alone. She consented to go, notwithstanding the vehemence with which I opposed her. 'My dear child,' (were her words at our parting,) 'this is the first trial in your young life; bear with it bravely, and you will be rewarded. It is for your benefit, as well as that of others, that I leave you; the time has now come when you should act for yourself, and expand those womanly qualities which I trust you possess; but if sorrow should visit you, send for me, and I will hasten to the child of my heart.'

"For some months after the departure of my beloved governess, I felt listless and depressed, and was only aroused from this apathy by my father announcing the arrival of a very dear friend (a widower) with his only child, and bidding me prepare for their arrival. Guests came but seldom to our quiet mansion; therefore the novelty and bustle of preparation caused me to forget for a time the loss o'er which I had been grieving. The finest linen was brought forth, the silver brightened, and the best chambers comfortably prepared for the accommodation of the expected guests. I had not questioned my father in relation to the friend he expected, but supposed him to be a quiet, middle-aged gentleman, with his tall son, or daughter. Upon their arrival being announced, entering the drawing-room to welcome them, I was startlingly surprised at beholding the group represented in that little drawing. I have been where youth and beauty congregate, but never beheld a face more winningly handsome, or a more graceful figure than belonged to Walker Saunders. The warm crimson mounted to my cheek and brow as I met his beaming but respectful gaze; and, when my father introduced us, I felt as awkward as a country girl could feel; but he came forward with graceful ease, and, taking my hand, expressed the pleasure he experienced in meeting the daughter of his friend; then laughingly disentangling his hair from the rosy fingers of little Nina, he gave her to the nurse, and, placing a chair for me, seated himself by my side. His graceful conversation and brilliant remarks caused me to forget he was a stranger, and ere half an hour had passed away, I was interchanging sentiments with him as if he were a well-known friend. 'Tis strange what power some minds possess to draw forth the thoughts that lie hidden in our hearts, and there plant the impress of their own feelings!

"Weeks fleetly by, and still Walker Saunders was our guest. Time had failed to depreciate him in my estimation. My father loved him as if he were his own child, for he was the son of one of his earliest and best friends. He had not seen Walter since his eighteenth year, when his father died; but he called him friend for that father's sake, and, now that he knew him, for his own inestimable qualities. Walter had early manifested a desire to seek his fortune upon the bosom of old ocean. At the age of sixteen, he made his first voyage, and from that period until the present, with the exception of a few months at a time, his home had been upon the surface of the deep. He was now the owner and captain of a fine vessel (called the Sea Foam), which, undergoing repairs, afforded him an opportunity of visiting his father's friend. Some four years previous to this visit, he married a beautiful West Indian; she was an orphan, and had no near kindred to bind her to the home of her birth; she therefore willingly accompanied her husband to a pleasant home in the city of Boston. He left her not until she had gathered kind though new friends around her; then he again sped across the waters; but this time his heart was in his home within the busy city. When he returned to that home six months after, he was shocked at the alteration that had taken place in his wife's appearance; the seeds of consumption had been concealed within her breast, and the severity of a northern climate revealed them when too late. All that human skill could effect was tried to save her, but in vain. Ere two summers had smiled upon their union, Nina Saunders slept within the silent grave. The little Nina was but pressed to a mother's heart, and was then motherless; thus, though young in manhood, sorrow's experience had cast a sadness o'er his spirit that caused him to be more interesting to one whose young heart had never hearkened to the voice of love. Was it strange, then, that one so perfect in every manly quality should be the first to awaken that voice within its depths? But I knew not that it dwelt there, until the evening previous to the morning of his departure, when we took for the last time our favorite walk to the ruins of an ancient castle. Our walk had been a silent one, with the exception of some few commonplace remarks, and in speaking them our voices shook with an unaccountable tremor. When we reached the ruins, the sun was just gilding with his parting rays the tops of the shattered chimneys; the birds were returning to their nests amid the moss and vines that clung to the broken walls. We seated ourselves upon a moss-grown column; together we sat for some moments, yet no words were spoken. I looked up wonderingly at Walter; but the expression of his dark eyes caused mine to seek the ground, whilst the warm blood stole to my cheek and brow. 'Dear-est Alice,' he murmured, as he drew me to him, 'I love you fondly, nay, devotedly; though I offer you not the first affections that have warmed my heart, I implore you to accept the hand of one whose love for you is as true and fervent as ever dwelt within the breast of man. I have known but little happiness. Will you not take compassion on me, and impart a brightness to the remainder of my life which will cause me to forget its early gloom? Speak, dearest,' he exclaimed; 'will you not be my own sweet wife, and a mother to my little Nina?' He gazed into my face as he concluded; the expression he there met with was sufficient without words, and he clasped me to his noble heart with all the fervor of joyous love. As we walked homeward, he told me he would intrust Nina to my guardianship until his return, when our marriage was to take place, and he promised after this voyage to bid farewell to the sea, and that, if my father consented to accompany us, we would seek together a flower-girt home on the Western Continent. Thus forming plans for the future, we reached home. My father expressed surprise that we had stayed so late, but when Walter led me to him, and asked his consent to our union, he joined our hands together, and fervently called down from Heaven a blessing upon his children!

"The next morning was a stormy and cheerless one; the clouds hung in black and heavy masses above the trees, which rocked fearfully beneath the sharp breath of the storm-king. We tried to persuade Walter to defer his departure; but he had promised to be on board his vessel within two days; he had but time to fulfil that promise, and could not tarry, though he fervently wished to do so; the moment had come to say farewell! Walter folded me in his arms, and pressed his trembling lips to mine; then gazing with one long last fond look into my eyes, whispered 'farewell, mine own one—our meeting will be a joyous one.' The little Nina stood beside us; taking her up, he kissed her o'er and o'er again; then placing her in my arms, and murmuring blessings upon his precious ones, he—was gone.

"Now our home seemed as if overcast by a cloud. Darling Nina alone could dispel its shadows; her childlike prattle and bird-like laugh were the only glad things in the dwelling. Many of my leisure moments were spent in wandering to those dear old ruins, and sketching in crayons. It was then I sketched Walter and Nina, as they looked when I entered the drawing-room on the day of their arrival. Letters too came to gladden my heart. When one came, I would hasten to my chamber, and read it over many times, then give the little pet all the kisses papa sent her. Those were indeed glad moments, but they were soon to pass away forever. The time had arrived when the vessel was expected home; gladness once again dwelt within our hearts; and we were joyfully awaiting his arrival when a letter sealed with black was handed to my father; he appeared bewildered, first gazed at the letter, then at me, but at last gained sufficient courage to open it; he read but a few lines, when that aged head was bowed on his hands, the letter fell to the floor, and his whole frame shook with emotion. 'Dearest father,' I exclaimed; 'what has occurred?' but as he answered me not, I eagerly snatched the letter from the floor, and in an instant had drunk in all its fatal contents. Years could not have contained more agony than that single moment did to me. Even now, my dear young friend, when the snows of sixty winters have whitened my hair, the memory of that letter causes my heart to quiver with emotion. Here it is, read it yourself; and Mrs. McNaully took from a little ebony box a letter worn and discolored by the hand of time: its contents were as follows:—

'MR. MCINTOSH—

'DEAR SIR: Being first mate of the Sea Foam, I am under the very painful necessity of communicating to you distressing tidings of your friend Captain Saunders. We were homeward bound, when, one morning, as the captain was promenading the deck, a little girl (the child of one of our passengers) fell overboard; fearing that by the time the boat reached her she would be drowned, and, being an expert swimmer, he gave the alarm, and sprang into the sea to rescue her; as he jumped from the deck, his head must have come into violent contact with the side of the vessel, causing him to become insensible, for he sank and rose no more. If he had become the prey of a shark, we would have perceived evidence of his fate in the discolored foam upon the waters; but it was not so, and the waves rolled on as calmly as before. The child was brought back to its mother's arms, but life had fled from its little body. Our voyage home has been a most sorrowful one. Crew and passengers mourn deeply the loss of the kindest of captains, and the noblest of men.

'In the captain's cabin, we found his will. Not knowing how to proceed, we read it in the presence of several witnesses. He has appointed you guardian to his child and betrothed wife (your daughter), who are jointly his heirs; when you feel prepared to do so, you will have the goodness to apprise me of your intentions as regards the vessel and its cargo.

'With feelings of sympathy, I remain yours,

'EDWARD HARRIS,

'First Mate of the Sea Foam.'

"You may imagine (the old lady again began) how desolate life appeared to me when I recovered from my illness; it seemed as if years of misery had been heaped upon me; even sweet little Nina now failed in drawing a smile to my pale lips. Kind Miss Smiley had hastened to me in the night time of my sorrow, and she now soothed and watched o'er me with all the tenderness and devotion of a mother. My father's health had been for some time declining, and, ere I had become resigned to Walter's death, I was called by the Almighty to receive the dying breath of my only parent; he blessed me in his last moments, and appointed me guardian to Nina, upon whom I had settled my portion of Walter's little fortune. We laid my beloved father to sleep beneath the shadow of a vine-clad rock in the wild and picturesque-looking burial-ground, where for centuries his relatives had been laid to rest. My mother slept beside him. Thus in death are reunited love's holiest and purest ties. My home was now the abiding-place of painful memories, and our means having become barely sufficient for our wants, in consequence of losses my father met with previous to his death, I concluded to seek a home in America. My dear governess consented to accompany us. Having disposed of everything save some precious relics, with heavy hearts we bid adieu to the land of our birth and the home of our ancestors. The last spot I visited ere we departed was the ruins of the old castle; and as I sat again upon the moss-grown column, methought that Walter was gazing down upon me from Heaven.

We stood upon a stately vessel's deck, and, as I gazed upon the wide expanse of waters, I pressed the little Nina more closely to me, for I was fearful I might lose her as I lost her father. Sweet and bitter fancies were mine during our voyage; sometimes the thought that Walter had been the victim of some dreadful monster of the deep would cause me to shudder with horror, and then again in imagination I would gaze down, down into ocean caves, and there behold him stretched on a bier of coral, a shroud of seaweed wrapt around his noble form, snowy pearls gleaming amid his raven curls, whilst beautiful sea-nymphs chanted o'er him a sweet and solemn requiem! Thus were my thoughts chiefly employed until we arrived in Boston, the city of our destination. Some weeks after our arrival, we succeeded in obtaining a commodious dwelling, for it was our intention to open a boarding-school for young ladies. At first we were not very successful, but within a few years our unwearied exertions, and the high recommendations we brought from Scotland, gained for our seminary the reputation of being one of the best in Boston, and we were obliged to limit the number of our pupils. Kind friends gathered around us, and life again wore charms for me. Darling Nina had grown quite tall, and very beautiful; her disposition was gentle, and deeply affectionate. Among our pupils, there was one in particular who became extremely attached to her; the many kindnesses she lavished upon my little pet won my heart. This young lady's name was Fanny McNaully; she was a bright embodiment of frankness and benevolence. The dazzling fairness of her complexion, and the sunny brightness of her curls, formed a beautiful contrast to the rich hue of Nina's skin, and the glossy ebony of her hair.

"Fanny, too, was an orphan; but she possessed a dear brother many years older than herself, who loved and cared for her with all the tenderness of a parent. Though residing many miles away, he frequently came to visit her. Sometimes he remained for several weeks in the city; then I had opportunities of becoming more intimately acquainted with him. His gentle manners and benevolent countenance interested me exceedingly. He wrote to me several times relative to Fanny's education. Miss Smiley laughingly remarked that it would have been more correct to have addressed his letters to her. When Fanny had been with us nearly three years, she returned home for the purpose of becoming her brother's little housekeeper. Then his letters came more frequently, and but three months had elapsed after Fanny's departure, when he came to the city. I was alone in the parlor when he called, and was about to send a servant for Miss Smiley; but he prevented me by saying, 'Will Miss McIntosh grant me a few moments' attention?' and, leading me to a sofa, he poured into mine ear words I ne'er expected to hear again. But he had found a nook within my heart that until now I had supposed was filled alone with memories of the dead; and when, after confiding to him the history of my early love, he still solicited a heart whose first throbs of love had been awakened by another, I consented to become his bride.

"Miss Smiley looked surprised when she entered the parlor, and found us together; but, after Edwin left, I told her our engagement, when, with a countenance beaming with kindness and sympathy, she fervently blessed me.

"After having fulfilled all engagements with my pupils, I transferred my school to another, for Miss Smiley had resolved to return to Scotland. She wished to spend her last days amid the dear familiar scenes of her native land; but she was not to leave until some time after our wedding.

"We were married upon a bright morning in September at church. Fanny and little Nina were my bride maidens. After the ceremony had taken place, we all came to Summerdale, where every preparation had been made for a brilliant entertainment. Many guests had been invited, and a portion of them awaited our arrival in the drawing-room. When I had exchanged my travelling dress for a wedding robe of white satin, and placed a cluster of tea-roses in my hair, Edwin came for me. Kissing me fondly, he conducted me down stairs, and with a proud smile presented me to his guests.

"The next day, as Edwin, Nina, and myself were seated together in the breakfast-room, Fanny entered with mock solemnity, bearing a bunch of keys upon a salver, which she delivered to me, formally resigning her office of housekeeper; then laughing joyously, she threw her arms about my neck, and kissed me repeatedly. Edwin's eyes sparkled with pleasure as he beheld this graceful manifestation of affection, and, placing her on the sofa beside me, he sat down and put his arm around us both as if thus to draw us more closely together; then clasping Nina with his other arm, he exclaimed, 'Now indeed we are a united family; may we ever be as happy as at present!'

"Miss Smiley remained with us until after the wedding festivities, and then bade us adieu with tears and blessings, to seek again the home of her youth.

"Though unblessed by children, our union was truly a happy one. For twenty years I scarcely knew a sorrow; but then, alas! tears of agony were again wrung from my heart, when stern death severed me from my husband. No friends were with me when Edwin died (his disease was enlargement of the heart). Fanny and Nina were married, and living in Kentucky. When they heard the sad tidings of death, they hastened to mingle their tears with mine. Now that I was alone and sorrowing, Fanny and Nina each offered me a home; but this dwelling was endeared to me by happy memories, and, though a shadow has been cast upon it, I determined never to leave it until death drew me from its shelter.

"A few years after my widowhood, I lost the greater portion of the property I possessed by the failure of the bank in which my funds were invested. Many of my friends advised me to dispose of Summerdale; its value would enable me to live luxuriously in a smaller establishment. But no; it had been my bridal home, and the loved home of my husband, and now it would have caused me bitter sorrow to have seen it pass into the hands of strangers. The very thought was desecration; therefore, to enable me to retain it, I concluded to receive a few boarders for the summer season, and I feel more cheerful since I have done so. There is less time left to me in which to dream o'er the past, and I often have opportunities of imparting strength to the invalid, and of beholding a smile of gladness steal to the lips of the mourner. It is most true that we are never so happy as when usefully employed. But I am afraid, my young friend, that I have wearied you with my egotism; and, as it is now the hour for lunch, I will impose no longer upon your indulgence."

Having assured her that I had been deeply interested, and owed her many thanks for the pleasant morning I had spent, I accompanied her to the dining-room. After partaking of some light refreshment, I strolled to a little grotto at some distance from the house, and there meditated on the simple narrative I had heard. How beautiful was the picture it presented! Though clouds of sorrow had flitted o'er her life, the sunbeams of happiness had also gilded it; her trials were caused not by error; therefore the sting of remorse embittered not her declining days. No children had been given to her; but to those who needed love and consolation she was a mother, pouring out of the fulness of her heart the balm of sympathy into theirs. I had heard from many of her goodness. If she had been willing to give up the blessed task of feeding the hungry and clothing the naked, she could have lived even at Summerdale without taking boarders; but life would have ceased to wear charms for her if she had been deprived of the happiness of ministering to the wants of suffering humanity.

During my stay at Summerdale, I had the pleasure of meeting Fanny and Nina (Mrs. Somers and Mrs. Lincoln), with their noble-looking husbands, and beautiful children. Then indeed our hostess seemed to have regained her youth, for the treasures of her heart were with her, and one morning I discovered her playing "pussy wants a corner" with the little ones, and I assure you it derogated naught from her dignity to mingle in the innocent sports of little children.

Years, long years have passed away. I have wandered in many places, and mingled much with the busy world; but never have I met with a more beautiful character than our hostess, nor spent a more delightful season than at Summerdale House.

 LINES SUGGESTED BY THE PLATE OF
 "LORD, HAVE MERCY UPON US!" IN THE OCTOBER NUMBER.

BY RICHARD COB.

ABBA FATHER! humbly bending
 At thine altar, now we kneel;
 May our prayer to heaven ascending
 Cause thee to regard our weal!
 Lord, have mercy now upon us—
 All our wanderings forgive;
 For the Saviour's cross hath won us—
 Jesus died that we might live!

We have done the things forbidden,
 Left undone the things of right;
 And our souls' pure love is hidden
 'Neath the shadows as of night:
 Shine, oh! shine, thou Sun of Heaven,
 Chase our darkness far away,
 And let unto us be given
 The sweet light of perfect day!

Lamb of God! all pure and spotless,
 Living still, and undefiled,
 Often have we, gay and thoughtless,
 Wandered, like the erring child,
 From our Father's home, and heaven,
 And His warnings oft defied;
 Be our souls' dark sins forgiven—
 Thou for us wert crucified!

Holy Spirit! boon of heaven,
 That within our souls hath birth,
 Oh! assure us we're forgiven!
 Lift our spirits from the earth
 To commune with saints in glory,
 In the paradise above,
 Who repeat the wondrous story
 Of a dear Redeemer's love!

Abba Father! humbly bending
 At thine altar, now we kneel!
 May our prayer, to heaven ascending,
 Cause Thee to regard our weal!
 Lord, have mercy now upon us—
 All our wanderings forgive,
 For the Saviour's cross hath won us—
 Jesus died that we might live!

COSTUMES OF ALL NATIONS.—THIRD SERIES.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE TOILET IN HOLLAND.

THE merchants, and better classes of the Dutch nation, all follow the French modes, with this difference, that they have not, as in that country, a dress suited to each varying season of the year.

The costume of the Dutch peasants is but little affected by fashion. The men's coats have little shape, and are made tight, without any fulness, and with very high, large pockets. Their breeches are immense, their waistcoats long; they wear a kind of round hat or bonnet, and stockings and shoes of a clumsy form.

The costume of the Dutch women is singular: their petticoats are very full, and exceedingly short, the sleeves long and tight, and the bodice laced in front, with a handkerchief pinned over the neck. An apron always forms part of this dress. The stockings and shoes are neat. They hardly ever wear any headdress, simply tying up their hair, and binding it with knots of black ribbon, or covering it with a hood. The Dutch paysannes are generally very large and unwieldy, and the elderly women formerly wore hoops to increase their size. The ladies preferred what is called the bell-hoop, or pannier; but the maid-servants, who always used them on great fête days, were only allowed the hoop that spreads out at the hips.

In the province of Guelderland, the richer of the peasantry are very smart. The coat and waistcoat are adorned with gold and silver buttons, which are placed close together all down the front; the waistband of the trousers is ornamented also with immense buttons; the shoes glitter with large silver buckles. A silver clasp is also worn at the throat, and silver buckles at the knees. This costume looks exceedingly gay and brilliant. The women of this province ornament their dress with gold; they place gold in their hair, and have golden trinkets hung about them on every part of their garments.

For the amusement of our readers, we will add the description of the attire of an Amsterdam belle of the last century, in holiday guise. "To begin with her head: it is covered with a small muslin cap, and a tiny round black silk hat, which is balanced upon the back of the head. A neat white handkerchief is fastened across the bosom with a pin, and carefully pinned underneath the arm; round her neck, upon the handkerchief, hangs a necklace, made of rows of gold beads. Her upper garment is a short, striped cotton bedgown; the body is laced before, the gown part reaching just below the hips, which are swelled out to a large size by her hoop; the sleeves of this garment are tight, and do not fall beyond the elbow; the petticoat, which reaches to the ankle, is of a red or green stuff, spread out to the size of a barrel, forming a strange contrast to the small head; the feet are encased in black shoes, with red heels and enormous buckles."

The following is the costume of a beau of that period: "The hair is rolled up above the ears, the hat is three-cornered, and in size about three-quarters of a yard from corner to corner; the white waistcoat is very long, the coat closely buttoned, and the shoes ornamented with Brobdiagnag buckles."

"The Dutch burgomaster always dresses in black. His lady appears in a bell-hoop, and a lace head-dress worth £100; but the daughter not unfrequently walks between this antiquated couple tricked out in all the 'bravery' of the last Paris fashions."

The dress of the peasants of French Flanders resembles that of the Burgundians. The women wear a kind of nightcap, with a plaited border, gold earrings, a gold cross hanging from the neck, a jacket, petticoat, and slippers. The petticoat is short and full, and the jacket is laced up the front. A black bib, and short black cloak, are also occasionally worn. No hats are ever seen in this part of the country; the common people, when they go out, throw over their heads a kind of thick veil, formed of three or four yards of stuff, and the better class of women wear camelot hoods; the latter also wear long cloaks of the same material.

The dress of the men consists of a long jacket, shaped much like those worn by the fishermen in many parts of England, breeches, shoes, and a small, square, flat cap.

The dresses anciently worn in the Netherlands seem to have been very splendid; for we read that when Jane, Queen of France, the wife of Philippe le Bel, visited Bruges in the year 1301, she was much struck by the pomp and magnificence displayed by the inhabitants, particularly the ladies, and exclaimed: "What do I see! I thought I alone was queen, but here I find them by whole hundreds!"

The women of Alckmaer (which may almost be called the capital of North Holland) dress in white, and have a singular headdress, but one that is very characteristic. A bandeau of lace is placed on the forehead, a thin plate of gold confines the hair in a semicircle at the back of the head, and terminates at each temple with a hook, which holds the curls. Over this horseshoe coiffure is a transparent lace cap, with long lappets, which hang gracefully down the neck.

CHAPTER XV.

THE TOILET IN AFFGHANISTAN.

In Elphinstone's "Caulbul," we find a description of the dress of many of the inhabitants of Persia, Tartary, and India; among the rest, of the Affghans.

"The women wear a shirt like that of the men, but much longer; it is made of finer materials, and generally colored or embroidered with flowers in silk; in the west, it is often entirely of silk. They wear colored trousers, tighter than those of the men, and have a small cap of bright-colored silk, embroidered with gold thread, which scarcely comes down to the forehead or the ears; and a large sheet, either plain or printed, which they throw over their heads, and with which they hide their faces when a stranger approaches. In the west, the women often tie a black handkerchief round their heads over their caps. They divide the hair over their faces, and plait it into two locks, which fasten at the back of their heads.

"Their ornaments are strings of Venetian sequins, worn round their heads, and chains of gold and silver, which are hooked up over the forehead, pass round the head and end in two large balls, which hang down near the ears. Ear-pendants and rings on the fingers are also worn, as are pendants in the middle cartilage of the nose, which was formerly the custom in Persia, and still is in India and Arabia. Such is the dress of the married women; the unmarried are distinguished by wearing white trousers, and by having their hair loose."

"The women wear a gown close over the breast, and very wide below. They wear many gold and silver ornaments, like those used in India. Neither sex wears the long shirt that is so common among the other Affghans. The women of the Eusofzyes are carefully concealed, and never leave their houses without putting on the cloak called a boorka, which covers them from head to foot."

CHAPTER XVI.

THE TOILET IN ARABIA.

We learn from various writers, both sacred and profane, that the ancient inhabitants of this sweet-scented land were the most commercial and civilized of the world; and "Araby the blessed" is honorably mentioned by Ptolemy, Strabo, and even Eratosthenes.

"Beautiful are the maids that glide,
On summer eves, through Yemen's* dales,
And bright the glancing looks they hide
Beneath their litter's roseate veils;
And brides as delicate, as fair
As the white jasmine flowers they wear,
Hath Yemen in her blissful clime,
Who, lulled in cool kiosk or bower,
Before their mirrors count the time,
And grow still lovelier every hour."—MOORE.

The costume of the Arabs, like that of most Eastern nations, consists of long robes, large trousers, an embroidered leathern girdle, and generally some weapon of defence, either a sword, knife, or dagger. There is, however, a great variety in their dresses. Notwithstanding the heat of the climate, the men wear a most preposterous headdress, frequently fifteen linen, cloth, or cotton caps, one over the other, the upper one being gorgeously embroidered in gold, and a sentence from the Koran worked upon it. Not satisfied with this curious coiffure, they add to it by wrapping round the outer cap a large piece of muslin, ornamented at the ends with silk and golden fringes, which stream loosely upon their shoulders.

Of so much importance is the coiffure with this people that, though when at home they perhaps allow their heads to feel the luxury of coolness and lightness, by laying aside twelve or thirteen of the caps, still, when on any visit of importance or ceremony, they dare not appear without the proper number. Writers on Arabian manners even assert that those who wish to pass for men of learning show their pretensions to that distinction by the size and weight of their coiffure.

It has been suggested that these extraordinary wrappings may be necessary to secure the wearer from the intense heat of the sun. This opinion is the more probable, as in ancient Egyptian monuments the same headdresses are frequently seen.

The common dress of the Arabs is very simple. It generally consists of a large white, or white and blue, shirt; and over this they sometimes wear a garment like a greatcoat without sleeves: in the province of Lachsa, in particular, this robe is worn by both men and women. The lower orders merely gird a piece of linen about their loins, and throw another piece over the shoulders; but never wear less than two or three caps, and have neither shoes nor stockings. In the mountains, where the climate is colder, they have sheepskin garments.

Persons of the middle class have sandals instead of shoes; they are single soles, or thin pieces of wood, fastened to the feet with leathern thongs. Richer people wear slippers, and the women always use the latter covering for the feet. In several parts of Arabia, the men do not wear drawers; but these last, with the addition of a shirt, always form the female dress. At Hedsjas, as in Egypt, they veil their faces with a piece of linen, leaving only the eyes uncovered. In Yemen, the veil is much larger, and covers the face, so that even the eyes are not discernible. At Sana and Mokha, the women wear a transparent gauze veil, embroidered in gold. They are very fond of rings on their fingers, arms, wrists, and ears; they stain their nails red, and their hands and feet of a brownish yellow, with the juice of a plant called el henne; they also paint all round the eyelids, and even the eyelashes themselves, with kochhel, which renders them quite black. Men even sometimes imitate this fashion; but it is considered effeminate.

The women of Yemen make black punctures on the face, which they consider improves their beauty. Fashion shows its influence in this country most particularly in the manner of wearing the hair and beard. In the States of Sana, all men, whatever their rank, shave their heads; in other parts of Yemen, it is the universal custom to knot the hair up behind, and wrap it in a handkerchief. Caps and turbans are not in use here. In the mountain districts, the hair is left long and loose, and is bound with small cords.

All Arabians of rank have one curious addition to their dress. It is a piece of fine linen upon the shoulder, which, probably, was formerly intended to keep off the heat of the sun, but is now used only as an ornament.

Carreri states that the Arabian women wear black masks, with elegant little clasps; and Niebuhr mentions their showing but one eye in conversation. In Moore, also, we find these lines—

"And veiled by such a mask as shades
The features of young Arab maids,
A mask that leaves but one eye free
To do its best in witchery."

In many parts of Arabia, the women wear little looking-glasses on their thumbs. All the women of the East are particularly fond of being able to gaze upon their own fair countenances, and seldom go without a looking-glass.

The Arabian princesses wear golden rings on their fingers, to which little bells are suspended, as well as in the flowing tresses of their hair, that their superior rank may be known, and they may receive the homage due to them. The following lines of L. E. L. might serve for the description of an Arabian princess:—

"Her silken hair, that, glossy black,
But only to be found
There, or upon the raven's back,
Falls sweeping to the ground.
'Tis parted in two shining braids,
With silver and with gold,
And one large pearl, by contrast, adds
The darkness of each fold.
Close to her throat the silvery vest
By shining clasps is bound;
Scarce may her graceful shape be guessed,
'Mid drapery floating round.
Upon the ankle and the wrist
There is a band of gold;
No step by Grecian fountain kissed
Was of diviner mould.
In the bright girdle round her waist,
Where the red rubies shine,
The kandjar's glittering hilt is placed,
To mark her royal line."

And with these graphic verses will we terminate our account of the toilet in Arabia; and, at the same time, close our "Costumes of all Nations," in the hope that it may be found useful and interesting to the many readers who require general information on the subject.

PRIDE OF BIRTH
A TALE OF CHRISTMAS TIME.

BY ALICE B. NEAL.

So Christmas drew near, the time for social gatherings in the neighboring plantations, accompanied by a round of unusual gayety in the parish. The Hamiltons, in a body, arrived at Haywood; for they had at last buried their animosity to the colonel's choice, now that John and Edward were of an age to marry, and May had turned out an elegant woman and an heiress. "The Hamiltons and Haywoods had always intermarried," they agreed, "and it was not at all proper to give up old customs." So Elizabeth Hamilton brought up her most stylish riding-habit, and a new hat sent from the North expressly for the visit. Pinckney Hamilton, her brother, had his own plans with regard to his cousin May. Besides, there was a party of stylish Northerners, whom they had met at Saratoga, and Miss Caroline's warm invitation, seconded by May, had drawn them to a new route of travel, to see Christmas holidays celebrated with good old plantation hospitality.

Miss Caroline had often spoken of these friends, the Clintons. They were also of English descent, and, as she often emphatically observed, were quite distinct from the Joneses and Thompsons of the new aristocracy—people one could not think of being civil to, much less inviting to their houses.

The Clintons, who had letters to the Hamiltons, joined them on their journey: the mother, a woman of elegant exterior and refined manner; a ward, Eleanor Wythe; and her son, who at first seemed so very unlike, that it was difficult to believe the relationship. Tall and dark, with a foreign air, Mr. Clinton might easily have passed for a Cuban, or played the part of a Spanish exile in society, had he been so inclined. The enthusiasm of his nature was visible in every movement, and yet there was much of his mother's tenderness in the glance, the tone, the softened manner, whenever he addressed a woman. At first, he seemed disposed to chat pleasantly with Philip; but the tutor gave little encouragement to all approach to intimacy. In his present mood, anything like condescension galled him, and the proud reserve of his manner once more returned. Biding, visits, hunting for the gentlemen, needlework and music in the female coterie, of course, left little time for the hours May had of late devoted to study. They still attempted to observe them; but the lessons were short, and interrupted for days together, and, when resumed, there was a wandering inattention, a preoccupied air, which he had never seen before in his pupil. Sometimes this mood came over her even in the midst of music or conversation. Philip, who knew every change in that face, often observed it. A troubled, thoughtful expression, which passed away with a word, and sometimes a glance of observation, from any of the little group, oftentimes subsiding into a quick flush mantling the cheek, or a startled motion of the hand, as if in fear lest she had betrayed its cause.

This was oftener the case when Mr. Clinton addressed her. Philip was quick to notice this, and all his past conjectures rose before him. She had never mentioned his name since her return, though they must have been often together during the summer, for they recalled familiar scenes, and even conversations. Then they must often have sung together, for their voices blended in rich unison, while Mr. Clinton hung over the instrument as if admiring the singer far more than the music she was rendering. He noticed, too, that Pinckney Hamilton, who had neither musical taste nor cultivation, always stood uneasily, in these duets, looking from one to the other, or making trifling and often almost rude comments on the air or the words. On the contrary, Mrs. Clinton and Miss Wythe, a fair, delicate girl, scarcely seventeen, always gave most delighted attention, and the colonel rarely absented himself from these impromptu concerts.

It was in an exquisite duet from "Lucia" that Philip first felt the pang of a jealous preference, as he saw them both carried on by the force of words and music to apparent forgetfulness of all else; and, when May followed its conclusion by the thrilling aria, "Robert, toi que j'aime," all he had imagined seemed at once confirmed. True, she did not once glance towards Mr. Clinton; but there was a depth of expression beyond mere artistic art trembling in every phrase, and this Philip could not but recognize. It had been a favorite air with her through the winter; he remembered this, and the reveries that had often followed it. The preoccupation, the restlessness, were now explained. How blind he had been! And perhaps they were acknowledged lovers, known to be so by all in the household but himself.

"Confirmation, strong as proofs of holy writ," was not long wanting. This was the cause of Miss Caroline's pertinacious admiration of Mrs. Clinton, a person she could neither comprehend nor appreciate; May's intimacy and correspondence with Miss Wythe; her frequent inquiries for the delay of Northern mails; the arrival at a time of general family gatherings. He could only repeat to himself, how blind he had been!

The excitement of the discovery, the watchfulness that had now become habitual to him, gave him little time for sober thought. He could not but acknowledge the noble superiority of Mr. Clinton, the fitness of the union of heart and intellect, as he saw them constantly together. Even Pinckney Hamilton called them a "splendid match," in the sporting phrases of which he was so fond, as he one day met them dashing down the avenue together, their fleet steeds seeming animated with one instinct; and Mrs. Clinton, who had come to see them mount, and still stood in the porch, looked after them with a fond and proud expression. As Philip entered the drawing-room, to return a handkerchief Mrs. Clinton had dropped, he, for the first time in many years, gave the mirror a searching glance. He saw no grace in his slender figure, no beauty in the masses of brown hair pushed back from his high white forehead, or the clear, gray eyes reflected there. The contrast with that well-knit form, the dark, piercing eyes, the bronzed cheek, struck him painfully. For the first time since his birth, he wished for manly grace and beauty.

Yet what could it avail him? He asked himself that, too; and he went away from them all, and forced himself "to try and examine his own heart" as he had not done before, far into the depths of that moss-grown wood; and there, to the echoless silence, he discovered all that had been so long concealed.

It was not the quick, fierce flame of passionate admiration that moved him; not a breath or whisper of self-interest—that did not even cross his mind; he would have hated himself had it done so—but the farther he looked into the past the more clearly he saw what May, and the dream of May, had always been to him, and how it had come to embody all that was beautiful in life or womanhood. And the self-deception was so utter. No word, no glance had lured him on, no hope of any future, no tender memories of any past: only an admiration for the heart and soul he had aided to awake, for the strong womanly tenderness that made up so large a part of her nature. Had the odorous, subtle breath of summer passed over him, the poison would have penetrated every vein; for he lay on the crisped leaves utterly aimless and hopeless, shrinking from all action, or even thought, after the first wild gush of emotion. But it was Christmas Eve—though he did not know it, the joyful opening of a joyful anniversary; and the stars came out clear overhead as when the angels sang on the plains of Bethlehem; and the cool, sharp atmosphere imparted kindly strength to his exhausted frame.

Lights were streaming from every window of the mansion as he returned—a welcome, cheerful light going out into the darkness—and he could hear the rude shouts and songs of merriment from the negro cabins, as they celebrated the commencement of their yearly holiday festivities. All happy, all joyful but him! It was a bitter contrast, and he gained his own room, thankful for its solitude. He saw the lights streaming out on the lawn, heard music and laughter, as the servants passed and repassed from the drawing-room. He remembered then that there was to be a little fête in honor of the evening, and that many families from miles around were to assemble, a part to remain through the following day.

Miss Wythe had laughingly challenged his attendance; he had always liked her gentle transparency of character, so different from the supercilious haughtiness of Miss Hamilton. He had promised her a spray of Cherokee roses, still blossoming by the hedge-row, for her hair. That was what he had gone in search of. It was too late now; but he must go and offer an apology, and play his part, even with this tumult of spirit. He could not understand himself the sudden strength that came to him; the careful attention to every duty of the toilet; the quick and sparkling repartee that seemed like inspiration when he joined the group of which Miss Wythe was the centre. She received him with a kind smile as ever, and drew out his rare conversational powers as he had never suffered them to be called forth before in society. It was as if his very cup of sorrow had proved an intoxicating draught. Mrs. Clinton listened in delight, Miss Hamilton condescended to thank him for a graceful compliment, and even May turned from her guests to mark the change. It was the recklessness of a spirit that had everything to conceal and nothing to hope for; but it supported him to the last. He left them with a smile and jest upon his lips, to return to solitude and anguish of spirit.

He had resolved to leave Haywood; it was the only definite thought his mind could entertain. To remain was more than madness—it was impossible. Now that, wilfully blinded as he had been, he had read his own secret, could he hope longer to hide it from others? And, besides, he could not remain to see her given heart and soul to another love, forgetting even their old intercourse in its absorption.

Christmas morning dawned on that sleepless night, the day of kind wishes and congratulation. It was the last he would spend at Haywood. His late appearance in the family circle was not noticed; there were so many strangers present, too, and that was a relief. Then the party separated to dress for church; for it was a long ride, and the colonel wished none of his family to be absent. It was the old parish church, built long before the Revolution, a part of the parish pride, for it was a monument to the liberality and the piety of their ancestors. For a long time it had been closed; its dilapidated condition, the long distance from many of the plantations, and the death of a former incumbent, had contributed to the cessation of regular Sabbath worship. Now among the visitors from the city was a clergyman, at whose proposal Christmas services were to be celebrated there. The breakfast-table conversation turned upon this, the antiquity of the church sounding delightfully to their Northern friends, and the mention of its picturesque situation exciting more than usual curiosity. The colonel was pleased with this, and waxed more than usually eloquent upon the history of the neighborhood, the part his ancestors and their connections had played in the early annals of the State, and the pride which he said it could be only a virtue to cherish in such recollections. All present, save Philip, could lay a part of this flattering unction to their souls; and the colonel talked on, warmed by the day, and the recollections clustering round it, unaware that any word seemed as an especial thrust to one wounded spirit. His only boast in ancestry was perfect integrity and uprightness; his only wealth the talents that he had inherited with the memory of these just men. He shrank under the words, though no eye observed him; even Miss Caroline listened with such self-satisfied eagerness that she forgot to be sarcastic. Once, only once he met May's glance; it was withdrawn in an instant; but it had a strange questioning earnestness, that he interpreted as pity, and that was galling even from her.

Nevertheless, he was of the church party. He could not deny himself the great happiness of seeing her this last day, as he so often said to himself, "The last time, the last time!"

The carriages, with their happy occupants, passed down the road before them. Miss Hamilton had chosen to be of the equestrians, as all could not drive, and she never lost an opportunity of claiming the especial attendance of her cousin Edward, or displaying her graceful figure. Philip rode moodily behind them, unfit for any conversation, and especially that of Miss Hamilton.

A picturesque scene greeted them, as a sudden turn in the road marked the entrance to the oaken copse in which the church was situated. A winding path through an archway of interlacing boughs, draped by the same long gray moss, and bordered by turf bright even at this season of the year, was lined with the saddle-horses, or large, comfortable family carriages that had brought the congregation together. The quick, impatient pawing of the horses upon the turf was the only sound that broke the Sabbath stillness, and the scattered groups united at the church door with only a quiet bow of recognition, so holy seemed the place. There were graves at the very door-stone, sunken and almost hidden by the fallen leaves, save that the time-stained burial-slab warned unwary feet that they pressed above where the dead had lain. The threshold itself, worn by the feet of many generations, marked the antiquity of that forest temple, and the gray-stone walls, the roof, over which the branches closed as if to shield it, and the long moss swept solemnly, were green with the marks of age.

They passed reverently up the sounding aisle, the stones of the pavement trodden by their fathers before them, and they knelt perchance in the very spot where blessings had been breathed upon their infancy by voices long hushed in the silence of death. Yet Philip saw but one face, and heard but one voice in the deep responses, or the anthem, when its clear strains led and sustained the rest in the absence of "lute or harp," full, rich, and thrilling with deep feeling, "as it had been the voice of an angel." The prayers, he tried to fix his wandering thoughts upon them; but, when the sermon had commenced, the effort was vain. That calm, beautiful face before him, lighted by earnest attention, made so much more lovely, if that were possible, by the close bonnet of black velvet, so suited to the time and place, and the heavy folds of the mantle sweeping in simple grace about her figure! he printed it all upon his memory for the years of absence that were to come. Rapt in her devotions, she could have little heed of this idolatrous worship of a human heart, and he struggled vainly with the sin and the shame, for the very time and place mocked the presumption of his love. Surrounded by those who claimed her interest, who wooed her with offerings worthy her acceptance, by tokens of her proud birthright and inheritance, how could he but feel deeper than ever before his own madness in daring to cherish

"That which bore such bitter fruit!"

It was a relief when the last amen sounded, and the congregation arose to disperse. Now there were smiles and kind greetings as they lingered in the aisle, or on the patches of turf bright with the mid-day sunshine. Neighbors with kindly inquiries, and gentlemen shaking hands heartily with old friends from whom they had been long separated. The beauty of the day, the congratulations of the season, jest and gaiety, had their turn. Here a lady sprang to the saddle from the hand of a gallant cavalier, or a white-haired servitor passed with a pile of cloaks and shawls for the occupants of a comfortable carriage. The Haywood party were among the last; for Miss Hamilton had been alarmed by the starting aside of May's horse on their way to church, and even the pleasure of Edward's undivided attentions could not induce her to mount it again. May, who had been detained by an old friend of her father's, at once offered to change places with her, good-naturedly doffed her mantle for the habit skirt, and sprang herself into the saddle.

Edward would have joined her; but Miss Hamilton beckoned him to the carriage-window, and, with her usual ill-bred selfishness, said, loud enough to be overheard—

"Let Mr. Anson play the groom, Edward; it's all he's fit for."

Shocked at such rudeness, Mrs. Clinton could not forbear a reproving glance, and even Edward blushed for his cousin, and with resentment at hearing his tutor so spoken of. But the other carriages were out of sight already, and he had little time to deliberate. Philip's hand seemed so powerless that he could scarcely guide his horse, when he found himself unexpectedly alone with May. The roll of carriage wheels died away before them; they had entered the woodland road that they had traversed so many times of old. May rode thoughtfully, her mind still turning to the services of the day, or she would have noticed the sudden blushing of the cheek, or the tremulous quiver of the lip when he essayed to speak.

"I beg your pardon," she said, suddenly reining in her horse; "I do not believe I have spoken for a mile. I was thinking of the gray old church, and how I wish it could be restored and consecrated by regular service. There is something so beautiful to me in its having been hallowed by so many hopes and fears, so many earnest prayers, and of my father's fathers. I am afraid there is a little pride unconquered in my nature still. I wonder how large an element it is in this wish."

So she had read what was in his heart, and she meant to show him kindly the great gulf set between them. He did not even look up in reply; but Miss Haywood continued—

"I never enjoyed a service more than this morning, my heart was so strangely solemn and thankful. I could almost wish there were to be no guests at Haywood to-day; I am in no mood for idle pleasantries. Mr. Clinton, I am sure, understood it, when he rescued me from the compliments of Major Laurens. What a full, deep voice he has! I heard it above all others in the responses this morning."

Again! She had never spoken so openly of her lover before. Kind, even in her probing his wounded spirit. And the house would be thronged with guests, and he should hear them speak of the fitness of the union, and perhaps be expected to respond smilingly. No, he could not do that; he would beg an interview with Colonel Haywood, and leave the house at once. It was best so; and, with this thought, he turned with so much of love and tenderness, and anguish in his gaze, that May's quick sympathy read some inward struggle, and, laying her gloved hand gently upon the arching neck of his steed, she said—

"You are ill or unhappy; you have been so for days, this long, long time. Cannot you tell me what troubles you, as in those old days when I was your confidante and comforter?"

She smiled upon him as she spoke, almost with a sister's tenderness; nay, had not his suit been so utterly hopeless, he would have taken that smile for a token of good, and poured out his whole heart to her. As it was, the tone, the glance, the light caressing motion almost unnerved him; a moment more, and confession would have burst forth, even with the present knowledge of its folly and fruitlessness. But, while the tumult of his soul shaped itself to words, a thought of his honor, and how she had been trusted to his training, came over him; he could not so wrong her father's generous confidence or her own, for he knew how much it would pain her kindly heart to speak words of pity or reproof, and her very gentleness restrained him. Still, he said within himself, "the last"—the last time they should speak without witness; the last time he should wind by her side up that familiar road; the last time he could claim her sympathy, or even a passing interest; and he dared not raise his eyes to her face again, lest his strong resolve should falter.

They dismounted at the entrance of the avenue, and Philip's hand thrilled at the light pressure, as he aided her to spring from the saddle. Mr. Clinton had come out to meet them. No, she could not have felt how he was suffering, or she would have spared that pleasant welcome—she would have detained him by her side a moment longer. Later in the day, with his hurried preparations finished, he sought Colonel Haywood. There was an unusual warmth in the manner of his host, who, nevertheless, betrayed anxiety and surprise at hearing that Philip had something of importance to say.

"Not business, I hope," he said, pleasantly. "I hate business at any time, and leave it as much as possible to my overseer and my factor. To-day, of all days, ought to be clear of it; and we have very little time, for the dressing-bell rang as you came in."

"I will not detain you long, Colonel Haywood, my kind and generous friend. I feel it now more than ever, when I am going from you!"

"Going! Why, Mr. Anson, what has happened? Did you have letters from the North this morning? I hope your mother is not ill. What is it? Can I know?"

"No, I had no letters; it is not so sudden a resolve. But I must leave you."

"Leave Haywood, and George and Hamilton doing so well! Haven't given you any trouble, I hope? Or am I to blame, or John, or that ridiculous nephew of mine, Pinckney?"

"Neither. No one is to blame, I believe, but myself."

The colonel seemed struck by the defection of tone to which Philip's hurried utterance had changed in the last sentence. He leaned against the mantle in silence for a moment, and then said, kindly—

"Mr. Anson, this is more than a mere freak. I have noticed your manner for several days past. I never saw a person alter more than you have done.

If it is possible, I beg you to tell me what has caused this. I do not ask from idle curiosity."

"I believe you, Colonel Haywood. You have always been kind, too kind to me. You should not have trusted me as you have done. I have betrayed your confidence. I go because I love your daughter!"

"And has my daughter rejected you?"

Philip could not believe that he had heard aright. He expected even, in his daring, to have heard a burst of astonishment, perhaps angry invective. But no; he should have known his host better. He was too proud to upbraid. The honesty of his purpose, and of that day's self-conquest, came to Philip's aid. He met the searching glance with a look as high.

"You do wrong to suspect me of so much ingratitude. Your daughter does not dream that I love her."

"Tell her so now."

"Colonel Haywood!"

"Do not look so indignantly at me, Philip. You came to me for advice, and I give it to you. If you do not follow it, I am not to blame."

"I did not expect taunts."

"And I never give them. You love my daughter, have told me so, and I give you my permission to address her. A strange 'taunt' I should have thought it at your age."

"Yet you know it is mockery—that she has already accepted another. Mr. Clinton"—

"Can't be engaged to two ladies at once, if he's a man of honor. Miss Wythe already has an old claim on his attentions."

"This is too much!" Philip said, bitterly. "It was hard to love her, thinking her heart was filled with another; but now, knowing she is free, it is the last drop in my cup."

"Then you are sure May does not love you?"

"I give you my word once more, Colonel Haywood, that I never thought it possible, even for an instant. I did not know that I loved her myself until yesterday."

"Then I have known more than you for a long time, and you have no certainty of rejection. Is not my daughter all you could wish in a wife?"

"I—my wife?"

"Yes. What shall I do to persuade you I am in earnest? Are you not all I could ask for her husband, high-principled, cultivated, warm-hearted? She has all you need, a little more money, to make other people appreciate your merits. You are all I could ask, Philip; I repeat it." And, while his hearty grasp yet thrilled every nerve with wonder and hope, and fear lest all should prove a dream, the colonel was gone.

A light step sounded near him, as he leaned, gazing into the glowing embers, and trying to comprehend all that had passed. The firelight shone warmly over the graceful figure of May, as she said—

"Did you wish to speak to me? My father tells me so. Why do you look so strangely, Mr. Anson? Philip, why have you been so sad all day?"

Perhaps—it was no stranger than what had already passed—she did love him; at least he could bear to be rejected now—now that it was not presumption to aspire; and he took the hand he had been told to claim within his own, while he imparted to her all that you and I know, dear reader.

But she had much more to tell than he at least had dreamed of. That she had always loved him from a child, before she knew the beautiful title of "wife" was dearer than that of sister—of the light and strength his counsel and praise had been to her, and the struggle with her impulsive nature to conceal all this under a cold reserve; for, though she read Philip's heart, and therefore could not trust her own, she had never thought, or even dared to hope, that her father or brothers would consent to their union, or that Philip's pride would ask it.

"So I had resolved never to marry," she said, looking up suddenly in his face, as she stood before him; "for I knew I never could love any one else so well—"

"Oh, May! my own, my own May once more! for you were mine, then, when your father gave you to my charge, were you not—and I am not going to lose you?"

"And yet," she said, when she spoke again, encircled by his arm, "my heart does not throb more quickly now, with all this gush of happiness, than when I met you, outwardly so calm, on your return, or to-day when we rode through the wood-path. We have both been very proud, Philip."

"Every heart knoweth its own bitterness, and a stranger meddleth not with its joy," says the wise man. Colonel Haywood thought their guests might, for the time, be kept in ignorance of this passing romance; but it was not that he repented his decision, or was fearful of any remonstrance from his sons. He judged, with his usual wisdom, that they would be both happier shielded from remark. But the Clintons, and Miss Wythe, on her bridal tour, were invited to the wedding festivities, when the next Christmas anniversary was kept, and with them came the mother and sisters of Philip to share in his happiness. The colonel seemed to enjoy scarcely less the mortification of the Hamiltons, Miss Caroline included, particularly when she informed him, in her usual pompous way, that she should return to town with Elizabeth and Pinckney, the latter equally disappointed in their matrimonial projects.

The parish church, where the bridal was celebrated, is now restored, and Philip, as its rector, is established in useful and honorable independence. The colonel is very attentive to his sermons, and speaks of his son-in-law in the parish with equal pride and pleasure; but Philip never hears the sweet voice of his wife in the psalm or hymn, without a sense of thankfulness for this "best gift of God's Providence."

LANDSCAPE GARDENING.

CHAPTER II.

OF PLANTING THE FLOWER-GARDEN.

THE manner of planting the herbaceous plants and shrubs in a flower-garden depends jointly on the style and extent of the scene. With a view to planting, they may be divided into five classes, which classes are independent altogether of the style in which they are laid out. The first class is the general or mingled flower-garden, in which is displayed a mixture of flowers with or without flowering-shrubs, according to its size. The object in this class is to mix the plants, so that every part of the garden may present a gay assemblage of flowers of different colors during the whole season. The second class is the massed flower-garden, in which the flowers are planted in masses of one kind, either in separate beds, or in separate divisions of the same bed. The third class is the select flower-garden, in which the object is limited to the cultivation of particular kinds of plants; as florists' flowers,

American plants, annuals, bulbs, &c. Sometimes two or more classes are included in one garden, as bulbs and annuals; but, in general, the best effect is produced by limiting the object to one class only. The fourth class is the changeable flower-garden, in which all the plants are kept in pots, and reared in a flower-nursery or reserve-ground. As soon as they begin to flower, they are plunged in the borders of the flower-garden, and whenever they show symptoms of decay, removed, to be replaced by others from the same source. This is obviously the most complete mode of any for display of flowers, as the beauties of both the general and particular gardens may be combined without presenting blanks, or losing the fine effects of assemblages of varieties of the same species; as of hyacinth, pink, dahlia, chrysanthemum, &c. The fifth class is the botanic flower-garden, in which the plants are arranged with reference to botanical study, or at least not in any way that has for its main object a rich display of blossoms. On each of these gardens, or manners of arranging plants grown for their beauty or curiosity, we shall offer some remarks.

The mingled flower-garden, or border, was formerly the most common; and was what every gardener attempted when planting his flower-borders. It is still the aim of the greater number of such as form parterres, or separate scenes, for the culture of flowers, but it seldom goes farther. The object here is to display a gay assemblage of colors during the season of flowers, without much regard to variety of form or diversity of character in these flowers, or the plants that produce them. The great art, therefore, in this kind of flower-border, is to employ such plants as produce large heads, or masses of flowers; to plant an equal number of every color, and such a variety in regard to time of flowering as may afford some of every color in flower from February to October. This object does not require a great variety so much as a judicious selection; for, supposing the number four to include all the colors of flowers, and one sort to continue in blossom a month, then for nine months of the year, viz. from February to October inclusive, only thirty-six sorts will be requisite to commence, as it were, the pattern of the border. Much more may be effected by a few sorts than by a great number; for the greater the number of sorts introduced in the pattern above thirty-six, supposing it correct that one sort continues in bloom a month, the greater the blank spaces that must remain between the plants in bloom. A moderate number of sorts, or of what are called border-flowers, and that number selected equally from the different colors, and the sorts in bloom in the nine months of the blooming season, is what demands the exclusive attention of whoever would plant a mingled border, or flower-garden.

To obviate the bad effect of decayed flowers, perhaps the best mode of managing ornamental flower clumps would be to have them partly planted with evergreens of low growth, or kept low by pruning; and between them to transfer from the pots in which they had been raised, the finest flowers of each season just taken on the point of flowering, in sufficient masses of each color, and to be removed and replaced with others as soon as they had done flowering, so as always to have a new and brilliant display at all periods of the year, and at the same time a due contrast of a more sober color from the intermixed evergreens.

In order to keep a mixed flower-garden always gay, successive crops should be provided partially in pots, the same principle being observed in furnishing a flower-garden as in embellishing a drawing-room. Suppose, for instance, the ground to be laid out, and permanently planted with perennials and such shrubs as are intended to remain immovable; the fixed foundation of the garden would thus be laid without further trouble than what consists in manuring from time to time those plants which exhaust the soil, and suffer in consequence. And this may be done to a greater extent than is supposed. Primroses, for example, thrive best at the foot of trees or bushes, provided they get sunshine in the first six months of the year; so do violets: and when the bloom of primroses and violets is gone, their foliage has its beauty. All sorts of spring bulbs, crocuses, hyacinths, dog's-tooth violets, jonquils, and the like, if placed with skill, require no removal; narrow lines look well, other things may stand between, and when their foliage is dead, the neighboring plants, if annuals, will do no harm; they may exhaust the ground, but periodical manuring will remedy that. Winter, when flowers are chiefly gone, must be provided for by well-grown evergreens with variegated or otherwise beautiful foliage, kept in pots, to fill the ground, upon some fixed plan, as soon as the favorites of autumn are dead, or become hopelessly unhealthy. Plunged in the ground, and the tops of their pots covered with soil, no one can tell that the flower-garden is not their constant station; they may be removed by degrees in the spring, and when finally gone, the whole scene is changed. Violets, white or blue, single or double, sweet or scentless, may be grown in the same pots, and will be always in the best place to welcome the vernal sun.

Abercrombie, Nicol, and other practical gardeners, seem to have no distinct ideas on the subject of arranging flowers in flower-gardens; but the authors of "Hints on laying out Gardens," and of the "Florist's Manual," have viewed the subject in its proper light. Neil also has some judicious observations on the subject. He says, "the plants are arranged in mingled flower-borders, partly according to their size, and partly according to color. The tallest are planted in the back part; those of middling size occupy the centre, and those of humble growth are placed in front. The beauty of a flower-border, when in bloom, depends very much on the tasteful disposition of the plants in regard to color. By intermingling plants which flower in succession, the beauty of the border may be prolonged for some weeks. In a botanic garden, the same plant cannot with propriety be repeated in the same border; but, in the common flower-garden, a plant, if deemed ornamental, may be often repeated with the best effect; nothing can be finer, for example, than to see many plants of double scarlet lychnis, double sweet-William, or double purple jacobaea."

Hogg, who may be considered an unprejudiced observer of the different tastes in disposing of flowers, has the following remarks: "We are apt to ridicule the Dutchman, as well as the imitators of him here at home, who divided their gardens into small beds, or compartments, planting each with separate and distinct flowers: we ridicule the plan because it exhibits too great a sameness and formality; like unto the nosegay that is composed of one sort of flowers only, however sweet and beautiful they may be, they lose the power to please, because they want variety. It must undoubtedly be acknowledged that a parterre, no matter in what form, whether circular or square, elliptical or oblong, where all the shrubs, plants, and flowers in it, like the flowers of a tastefully arranged bouquet, are variously disposed in neat and regulated order, according to their height and color, is a delightful spectacle, and worthy of general imitation. Yet still, in some particular cases, I am disposed to copy the Dutchman, and I would have my bed of hyacinths distinct, my tulips distinct, my anemones, my ranunculuses, my pinks, my carnations distinct, and even my beds of hollyhocks, double blue violets, and dwarf larkspurs distinct, to say nothing of hedgerows of different sorts of roses. Independent of the less trouble you have in cultivating them when kept separate, you have beauty in masses, and you have likewise their fragrance and perfume so concentrated that they are not lost in air, but powerfully inhaled when you approach them. Mrs. Siddons, the celebrated tragic actress, was a great admirer of this mode of planting, and fond of contemplating this 'beauty in masses.' She adopted this style of gardening at her residence on the Harrow Road. Her favorite flower was the Viola amœna, the common purple heartsease, and this she set with unsparing profusion all around her garden. Her garden was remarkable in another respect, and might with great propriety be styled a garden of evergreens, which, together with a few deciduous shrubs, were of the most sombre, sable, and gloomy cast, such as box-trees, fir, privet, phillyrea, arbor vitæ, holly, cypress, the red cedar, laurel, Irish ivy, bay-tree, arbutus, spurge-laurel, &c. The only part of the year in which it could be viewed with any degree of satisfaction was the winter, as giving rise to a pleasing association of ideas in beholding these retain their green verdure and clothing, at a time when the rest of the surrounding trees were stripped naked and bare."

If a double border, with a walk on each side, a bed-group, or compartment on a lawn, to be viewed on all sides, is to be planted, then it is only necessary to fix on the number of rows, and to keep the lowest plants in the margin and the tallest in the centre, adhering in the rows to the order of time and of colors given above, or to any order that may be fixed on, and inserting shrubs in lieu of plants where it may be deemed advisable.

Flowers in borders should always be planted in rows, or in some regular form, and this appearance should be assiduously kept up by trimming off all irregular side-shoots and straggling stalks, and reducing the bulk of plants that grow too fast. Every approach to irregularity, and a wild, confused, crowded, or natural-like appearance, must be avoided in gardens avowedly artificial.

With four colors, four sizes, and six times of coming into flower, a mingled border may be commenced with ninety-six sorts; and the pattern may be repeated like the border of any work of art ad infinitum; but it is also evident that it may include any number of species, provided these have the desired requisites of height, color, and time of flowering; the second and every successive repetition of the pattern being made up of different, and not before-introduced species, but still of the heights, colors, and times of flowering required for the first example of the pattern. The safest way, however, is to adopt but a moderate number of species, and those of the showy sorts that have numerous varieties, and are of hardy vigorous growth.

The massed flower-garden is now by far the most common, though it is comparatively of modern invention; and it must be confessed that, whether the principle of arranging flowers in masses of one color be applied in borders along walks, or in beds on lawns or gravel, the effect is striking and brilliant beyond that of any other manner of planting. The principal point to be attended to is to keep the plants as near the ground as possible, so as to display the flowers without showing any of the leaves or stems. The effect intended to be produced is that of a Turkey carpet in which the pattern is defined by masses of color strongly contrasted with each other; each bed presenting a different color, and being filled with one kind of flower. It is evident that a garden of this kind requires great knowledge of plants, skill in their cultivation, and taste in the arrangement of their colors, to produce a proper effect; for, unless such plants are selected as will flower all at the same time, and grow all to the same height, the unity of the design will be lost. The plants must also be well grown, and be in a high state of health and vigor, or they will not flower properly; and their habits of growth must be compact, for if the stems are drawn up it will be impossible to cover the bed without showing them. Even when all this is done, the whole will be spoiled if skill be not shown in the arrangement of the colors. To do this properly, it is necessary to study what are called the complementary colors. There are but three simple colors in nature; viz: blue, yellow, and red. But there are also three compound colors; viz: green, which is a compound of blue and yellow; orange, which is a compound of yellow and red; and purple, which is a compound of red and blue. Now, according to the law of complementary colors, every simple color requires a compound color, composed of the other two simple colors, to be next it—as, for example, red requires green; blue, orange; and yellow, purple; and, indeed, it is said that, if you look steadfastly at a circle of red you see a rim of green round it, and the same of the other colors. In addition to the colors enumerated, all of which may be found in flowers, white may be introduced to harmonize any two colors together. The beds for gardens of this kind must always compose some regular figure, but the walks which separate them may be either of grass or gravel.

To give an example of a massed flower-garden, Fig. 1 is a plan of flower-beds on turf, surrounded by a border for flowers; beyond which is a bank of flowering shrubs, beginning with low sorts, and gradually rising to such as are considerably higher.

Fig. 2.

A circular flower-garden is shown in Fig. 2. It is placed in a recess of a shrubbery or lawn, and the exterior bed is surrounded by turf, no part of which is narrower than five feet, and beyond there is a border of low shrubs. The central mass, which is ten feet in diameter, contains a collection of China roses, including R. semperflorens, sanguinea, and all the varieties of Noisettida; and the interstices are planted with a mixed collection of bulbs. There may be a standard purple Noisette rose in the centre; and the marginal line should be of mixed hyacinths. The other beds are proposed to be planted with herbaceous plants, bulbs, and showy greenhouse plants.

HOME EXERCISES.

We present our readers with two more cuts of the series of calisthenics, which will be the last. In closing the subject, we feel gratified in being able to remark that many of our readers have evinced, by their inquiries, a very laudable interest in the practical illustrations we have afforded them of the importance of the exercises to the general health of persons of sedentary habits and employments. If we have not been more particular in enforcing the necessity of these exercises, by long dissertations, it was because we thought, after our first essay, that it would be tiresome to repeat to intelligent readers that which must have always been plain and obvious to their comprehensions. Health, the greatest blessing which God bestows upon his creatures, like the graces, can only be secured by implicit obedience to His will, which, as we may readily ascertain by contemplating the course of nature, is opposed to slothfulness and inactivity.

SKETCHES OF SOUTHERN LIFE.

THE BALL.

BY PAULINE FORSITH.

"We are going to have a ball here next week," said Virginia Percy to me, a few days after my arrival at Loudon.

"A ball!" repeated I, my heart filled with delight at the thought. "Where is it to be held?"

"At the American House; that large brick building in the principal street," replied she.

"I do not see how it can affect you, Pauline," said Miss Johnson, "whether they have a ball here or not, or where they have it, for I should not suppose you would think of going, if you were asked. One who sets up, like you, for being a teacher, ought not to care for such trifling amusements, but give a better example. Nothing would induce me to dance; in fact, it is against my principles entirely. And, besides, there is no probability of your being invited, as you know so few here."

"Oh yes," said Virginia, "she will be invited; Major Dillon is coming to ask her to-day."

"Who is Major Dillon?" asked I.

"That very tall man who called here a day or two ago."

"Ah, the one that looks so much like Ichabod Crane, I presume?" observed I.

"I don't know Mr. Crane," said Virginia.

"He is a Boston gentleman, I presume," said Miss Johnson; "and you surely cannot expect, Pauline, that Miss Percy should know anything about them."

"He is not a Boston gentleman," I replied, hesitatingly, half afraid to tell who he really was; "it is only a character in one of Irving's stories."

"Pauline," said Miss Johnson, seriously, "I wish to give you some advice. I hope you will not be offended with me; but it is all for your own good. If you ever expect to be married, or if you wish gentlemen to like you, you must leave off talking so much about books. So far as my experience goes, gentlemen like young ladies to be religious; nothing makes so good an impression on them as that; but they do not like them to read. They are afraid of you, if they think you read much; so, if you know your own interest, you will pay a little more attention to religion, and less to books."

Miss Johnson was interrupted in her edifying harangue by Elsie, who, thrusting her shining face into the room, said—

"Major Dillon come, Miss Pauline, and ben ask for you."

"Oh, do come in with me!" said I, imploringly, to Miss Johnson.

"No, indeed; do you think I would go to see a gentleman who has not sent for me?" was the reply.

"Won't you come, Tom?" and I turned to the more amiable Virginia.

"I cannot very well, dear, just now," replied she.

"I must finish this dress. I will come in as soon as it is done."

"Oh, what shall I do?" exclaimed I, perfectly overpowered at the thought of being obliged to receive and entertain by myself a strange gentleman. I should have refused to see him at all, only the idea of the ball-ticket he had brought for me nerved me to the great undertaking. "If I only knew what to say to him! What shall I say, Tom?"

"Oh, anything you happen to think of."

"I cannot think of anything."

"Well, tell him it is a very pleasant day."

"He waiting, missy," said Elsie, always smiling.

"I suppose I must go;" and I gave a hasty glance at the mirror, and rushed boldly towards the parlor. I stopped a moment at the door to gain courage; but, as I found quickly that moments so spent were worse than lost, I entered in an agony of bashfulness, which I felt even at my fingers' ends.

A figure commenced slowly rising as I appeared, and, in a few moments, having reached its full height, stretched out a long arm and grasped in his immense hand my red and trembling fingers, and bending on me a pair of kindly encouraging eyes—albeit rather of the fishy order—uttered, in a deep, sepulchral voice—

"Good evening, miss."

The sun was still bright in the western sky; but, as I learned afterwards, there is no afternoon at the South; the people there, whether it is owing to their fondness for extremes or not, I leave to wiser heads than mine to discover, rush at once from morning to night.

"Good evening," replied I.

"A very pleasant day, miss?"

"That is my speech," thought I; but I only answered, "Yes, sir."

There was a long silence. Deprived so entirely of my one idea, I sought in vain for another. I tasked uselessly my laboring brain; like Viola, the only answer it returned to my searchings was, "A blank, my lord;" and Major Dillon seemed equally at a loss. At last—

"I have brought you an invitation to the ball we expect to have next Tuesday," said he.

I bowed.

"I hope you will allow me to accompany you?" he continued.

"I should be very happy," replied I, blushing still more.

Another long silence. At length, Major Dillon perceived a backgammon-board on the piano.

"Can you play draughts?" he asked.

"A little," said I.

And so we sat down to try our good fortune at that innocent amusement. Which was successful, I do not remember; I am not certain that I knew then; but it helped wonderfully to pass off the time; and, half an hour having been spent under the pretence of pushing those harmless little black and white men about, Major Dillon rose to go. Just then, Virginia appeared at the door.

"Good evening, Miss Tom," said the major, solemnly.

"Are you going so soon, major? I was just coming in to have a little chat with you," said she, with so much ease and self-possession, that I looked upon her with wonder and admiration. Major Dillon was, of course, very sorry that he could not stay, but had some very important business engagement; that convenient excuse for all gentlemen, whether married or single.

"You will take tea with us on Tuesday night, will you not?" asked Virginia; "and we can all go together from here."

The major accepted the invitation, made his adieux, and departed, to my great relief.

I became acquainted with a number of the young ladies of Loudon during the few days preceding the ball, and the grand topic with them all was, of course, the dress to be worn on that important occasion.

"I wish I knew whether to wear my pink silk or blue crape," said Miss Bessy Moore. "I cannot decide which is the more becoming."

"All colors are equally becoming to me," said Narcissa Hunt, the belle of Loudon, so far as any one was the acknowledged beauty among so many young girls, nearly all with some claim to personal charms. She had been educated at a fashionable school in Philadelphia, and had returned with fourteen trunks filled with finery, a variety of airs and graces, all entirely new in that part of the country, and learned in all the accomplishments and sciences under the sun, except that most important one of all—one which a friend of mine calls "the power of retention." Hers might truly be called a transparent mind, and her own beauty, being the main subject of her thoughts, was often the theme of her discourse.

"What shall you wear, Pauline?" asked Virginia.

"My white muslin," said I, unhesitatingly. As it was the only dress I had, or expected to have, for such emergencies, I was freed from the trouble of deciding between opposing claims. While all the others were debating, and trying on, and perplexing themselves about their outward adornment, my mind, at perfect rest, could expatiate at its own pleasure on the enjoyment in prospect. And I may as well state here that white muslin figured at all the parties in and around Loudon for more than a year; for, being at that time in blissful ignorance of the world and the world's ways, I had no idea that it was not considered comme il faut to wear the same dress two successive evenings. The main requisite for enjoyment in my mind, at that time, was, I confess, to have plenty of partners, and, as gentlemen were much more numerous than ladies in that part of the country, I had no difficulty in realizing my wishes.

The ball was to commence at seven o'clock, and, in order to be ready, we began our toilet directly after dinner. Virginia and I had, after the fashion of young girls, struck up a violent friendship, on the altar of which Virginia had sacrificed her feminine vanity to an extent that, I am afraid, will hardly be credited in this skeptical world. She had determined to dress as much like me as her wardrobe would permit, and, for the whole time during which my muslin dress flourished, she laid aside the pink, blue, buff, or lilac silks, with which her generous parents had provided her, and wore nothing but a plain white satin, the only white party-dress she had, made as simply as possible. Did Pythias do much more for Damon?

Our hair was arranged in what Mrs. Robinson called "a confusion of curls" on either side, each of us having exactly the same number of ringlets, a white rose and rosebud, with a few geranium-leaves, carefully counted, that one should not have more than the other, adorned our heads. Two similar little bouquets, that might have been stereotyped fac-similes of each other, were fastened on our dress in front; and, when we had finished, we resembled each other as much as a white satin can resemble a white muslin, or a little plump figure—I cannot find it in my heart to call myself "dumpy"—can a tall, graceful, fawn-like one.

There was still half an hour or more to be spent before it was time to go, and we seated ourselves by the fire waiting, in restless silence, for the slow-footed moments to pass. Presently, we heard a carriage drive up to the gate.

"That must be Mrs. Robinson," said Virginia; "she has come to 'patronize us,' as she calls it."

"Yes," replied I, "it is; I see a bright yellow dress and pink scarf that can belong to no one else. I only hope she will not call me her 'pretty prodigy,' as she did yesterday. I do not like the idea of being any one's protégé."

"Mrs. Robinson wants to see you, Miss Tom and Miss Pauline," said Elsie. And, obedient to the summons, we went to the parlor.

We found Major Dillon and Mr. Cuthbert, the gentleman who was to accompany Miss Percy, waiting there, with Mrs. Robinson, for our appearance.

The lady, after greeting us very warmly, examined us with the eye of a connoisseur.

"How very plainly you are dressed!" she exclaimed. "Have you no ornaments?"

"I have none," replied I; "and Virginia preferred not to wear hers on that account."

"Ah yes," said Mrs. Robinson. "Well, I thought perhaps a few trifles might be of service, and so I brought my jewel-box." And she opened a large case by her side, filled with the most showy and expensive ornaments. She displayed these temptingly before our admiring eyes; but tried uselessly to induce me to adorn myself with them. I had not read in vain the fable of the jay in borrowed plumage, and resisted steadily all entreaties, and even the subdued brilliancy of a set of diamonds and pearls that were held in every light before me.

"If you will not wear anything of mine, have you nothing of your own?" asked Mrs. Robinson, rather petulantly. "You must not go as you are; you look too simple."

"I have no ornaments at all," said I.

"Oh yes, you have," exclaimed little Imogene Percy, the youngest flower of the family, everybody's pet and plaything, and called, of course, Puss—what Southern family of any size has not a Puss among some of its members?—"oh yes, you have," said Puss; "don't you remember that box of pretty things I have just been looking at?"

"That is not a jewel-box, darling," said I.

"Ah, I have no doubt we shall find something useful for such emergencies," said Mrs. Robinson, smiling and nodding. "Run, Puss, and bring it."

"Oh no!" I cried. "There is really nothing in it. I would rather not have it brought."

But, at the first word from Mrs. Robinson, Puss had darted from the room, and returned almost immediately with a square box of moderate size.

"Bring it here, dear," said Mrs. Robinson. "Let us see if we cannot find something."

Though I was covered with blushes and confusion at the thought of the disclosure that was about to take place, yet a secret delight in the astonishment that awaited Mrs. Robinson at the sight of the contents of my jewel-box prevented me from making any farther opposition to their being displayed. They might safely be considered as a fair exponent of the various stages through which my mind had passed. Imogene had been amusing herself with them, and consequently they were in a state of great confusion when Mrs. Robinson's eyes first opened on them.

On the top lay several little articles ingeniously cut in wood, the work of a boy-lover of mine in my school-girl days, which he had given to me, with quantities of maple sugar and bits of bright-colored ribbons. The maple sugar and the ribbons had long disappeared, together with his love; but the thread-winders and needle-cases, cut with true Yankee skill, were still cherished among my mementos. After these pledges of departed affection, came several shells, for I had had a passion for conchology; they were really very pretty, and somewhat valuable; but no one admired them excepting Imogene, who thought the box a far more wonderful one than Mrs. Robinson's. Next came some fine specimens of quartz, rock crystals, and mineral ores; for I had once taken a fancy to geology, and devoted myself to that science for three whole weeks with the most intense ardor.

"What pretty rocks!" exclaimed Imogene. They have no stones nor pebbles; nothing but rocks.

I had also been possessed, at one time, with a mania for collecting coins, and had quite a number, principally copper ones, in this universal receptacle. These were examined with more curiosity than the rest, though there was displayed a little boxful of dried insects, on opening which, Mrs. Robinson shrieked with horror; a small collection of autographs; some sea-mosses, prettily dried and arranged; and, at last, what I was accustomed to call my American antiquities—some of the heads of Indian arrows, that had been dug up on a farm of one of my relatives, a bullet from Bunker Hill, and a few other trifles valuable only from association. The arrow-heads were the only things which seemed to strike Mrs. Robinson.

"I have half a mind to ask you to give me one or two of these for Mr. Robinson's cabinet," said she, examining them.

"It will give me great pleasure, if you will accept them," I replied. "Has Mr. Robinson anything of a museum?"

"Oh no, only a few mooseyacs and other things he brought from Venus, when he returned last summer. The most interesting curiosity he has is a very old spinster."

"Is that considered a remarkable curiosity?" asked Mr. Cuthbert.

"Certainly," replied Mrs. Robinson. "The one we have is said to be the one Queen Elizabeth played on in her imprisonment among the lions in the Tower. You know," turning to me, "the queen that Cromwell treated so badly, and that ran away with Charles, and afterwards was beheaded? I presume you know all about it."

I did not know whether to say yes or no, and so I merely bowed.

"History," continued Mrs. Robinson, delighted to hear herself talk, "I consider a most absorbing study. I have devoted myself to it lately entirely. I read several pages, or at least two, in it every day; and, as I think it important to be first well stored with the knowledge of our own country, I have begun with Knickerbocker's celebrated History of New York, as I was originally a native of that State. My ancestors came over there at least six hundred years ago, when it was all a howling wilderness, and for that reason I feel an interest in it; though I have resided here since I attained the age of four months."

"Indeed!" said I, seeing I was expected to say something.

"Yes, my dear; but, if I sit talking much longer, I shall certainly subside, and it is time that we were thinking of going. So do make up your mind to wear some of my ornaments. I shall really be hurt, if you do not. Now, here is my favorite one; let me try it on."

And she pulled out a tiara of brilliants, that glittered like diamonds, though I presume they were only imitations. I shrank with evident reluctance at the idea of wearing so showy an ornament; but my weaker will yielded to Mrs. Robinson's importunity, and, placing it triumphantly on my head, she led me to a mirror. I gave one hasty glance, and, catching a glimpse of the flashing and glittering diadem that blazed remorselessly over my shrinking head, I exclaimed—

"I cannot wear it; indeed, I cannot."

"Oh, my dear, you have no idea what an addition it is to your improvement." And she appealed to the gentlemen.

Mr. Cuthbert said nothing; but Major Dillon was evidently struck.

"It is splendid!" said he.

That settled the matter; and, most unwillingly, I accepted my destiny, which seemed bent on making me a conspicuous object where I had hoped to glide along unobserved. My "greatness" was "thrust upon me," and I endured it in deep, though silent tribulation. Virginia, vexed at Mrs. Robinson's interference, and thus preventing us from appearing like twin roses on one stalk, wound a chain of pearls around her head to make the difference less striking; and, thus attired, we prepared to go.

"But you have had no tea, girls," said Mr. Roscoe, a jovial old gentleman, an uncle of Mr. Percy's, who was spending the evening there. "We left the table standing for you half an hour ago."

We both protested that we had not the slightest desire for any; nor could we, by any entreaties, be induced to touch a morsel.

"At any rate, then, drink a glass of wine," said he, turning some out from the decanters, that stood always filled on the sideboard. "Here, Miss Pauline, is to your two husbands!" And he filled a bumper for himself, and a glass not quite so full for me.

I hesitated a moment about drinking such a toast; it did not seem to me exactly proper; but, feeling that laughing eyes in all directions were bent on me, I swallowed the wine and the husbands, and hurried Major Dillon out of the room as soon as possible.

After we reached the hotel, Mrs. Robinson detained us some time in the dressing-room, till she had arranged her head-dress, that crowning finish to her gorgeous attire. It was a blue and silver affair, with two long streamers on one side, and a drooping plume, that waved gracefully over her shoulder, on the other.

"I cannot let you outshine me, Pauline," said she, smiling and bridling, and we entered the ball-room, Mrs. Robinson mincing, and, to translate a very expressive Italian word, peacocking herself all the way up the long dancing-hall, followed by mon petite moi-même, leaning, or rather hanging on the arm of my tall cavalier, and feeling at every step as though my hold upon the earth was very insecure. But I soon forgot my own sensations in the scene that surrounded me. The room, a very large one, though quite low, was brilliantly lighted, and filled with gentlemen and ladies, all apparently bent on enjoying the few hours of pleasure to their fullest extent. There was no nonchalance in their movements, or haughty exclusiveness in their air or manner, nor any of those thousand and one exhibitions of pride and vanity that mar the pleasure of such assemblies in more sophisticated regions; and yet the ladies of the party might, in loveliness, grace, or taste in dress, have compared favorably with any assembly that I have since seen in either of the three largest Northern cities. Their gracefulness, evidently natural and untaught, was their most striking peculiarity; and I observed hardly one there whose hands and feet might not have been models for a sculptor, so unlike were they to the Northern ladies, among whom such beauties are remarkable for their rarity. The gentlemen, some of them at least, might perhaps have been improved by a little more polish; but, then, what part of the world is there of which the same might not be said? I remember that several of them were without gloves.

The young ladies were, as usual, generally dressed in white or pink; the only thing in which they had given free rein to their fancy was in the arrangement of their hair. If people have any eccentricities of character, they are sure to betray them by their hair or their caps. One young lady had brushed hers entirely off her face; Narcissa Hunt had concealed nearly all her beauty by bringing her dark tresses in two bands plastered flat to her face over each cheek and down quite to her chin, leaving only a narrow strip, the mere outline of her face, visible; another had covered her forehead and cheeks with quantities of little flat curls, called there beau-catchers, though I do not know that they fulfilled the promise implied in their name; and still another had filled her head with flowers of every hue, so that, to look down upon her from above, you would have imagined her to be an immense moving bouquet. They were natural flowers, besides, and, before the evening was over, they had faded, and hung drooping and withered about her ears, giving her a very forlorn appearance.

All these observations were the result of the few quiet moments I passed while Major Dillon was looking for a vacant place in some quadrille. As soon as I began to dance, I forgot everything else in the room. Sidney Smith says, "Mankind are always happier for having been happy," and I firmly believe, if that one evening should be blotted from my memory, one of my greatest pleasures would have disappeared with it. For I was in such a state of entire, yet bewildering enjoyment, that, on endeavoring to recall any incident that occurred, I find I can remember little else than that I danced heart and soul, and body, too, I suppose, though I was certainly unconscious of my body the whole evening. That I had partners, I assume to be a certain consequence of my dancing, as they are generally considered a necessary appendage to that amusement; besides, I remember being at one time engaged fifteen "deep," as we called it there; and, also, I recall several little disputes when I changed partners, as to which of the gentlemen was the one who had a right to claim me as his companion for the next dance, all which discussions I looked on as utterly irrelevant and useless.

Nothing is perfect, though, in this world, and I can recall one cloud that dimmed for a while my perfect enjoyment. It came in the shape of a partner who did not know the figure. Why will people undertake to dance without knowing how, and so plunge not only themselves, but their innocent companions in shame and confusion? All my nods and bows expended for his guidance were worse than useless, for they only increased his perplexity; and, besides, he did everything with such a flourish, that, evidently thinking that his duty was to keep me with him wherever he went, he dragged me into the strangest situations with the most irresistible and all obstacle-overcoming ardor. Every two or three minutes, he seemed to think it necessary to balance, or, as he called it, "set" to his partner, and, no matter whether we were chassés, or in the midst of lady's chain, or in any other part of the figure, he would cut two or three pigeon-wings, seize me by both my hands, and whirl me round, holding me so firmly all the time, and dancing so unceasingly, that I could only release myself with great difficulty. When we came to the jig, always danced at Loudon with spirit, he persisted in following me round the whole quadrille, and balancing with me to each gentleman, notwithstanding my earnest exhortations to him to go back to his place; and, when it came to his turn to leave me and pay his devoirs to each lady, not an inch would he stir, but remained cutting pigeon-wings unceasingly by my side, and turning me whenever he found an opportunity. I felt more like a teetotum than anything else, when, at last, I found myself released from him. I have never seen him since; but, if he has made as devoted a husband as he was a partner, his wife is indeed blest.

The supper-table was spread with a more substantial repast than is usual in our Northern cities; instead of jellies or ice-creams, there were huge pyramids of cakes of all descriptions, floating islands, whips, custards, and a variety of other articles, all made by the people in the house. There was a side-table, patronized chiefly by the gentlemen, covered with roasted turkeys, chickens, and ducks, not failing, of course, in that favorite dish of every true-hearted Southerner, a boiled ham. There was also a sideboard, which Father Matthew would have groaned over, and with good reason, if he could have seen it.

The meagreness of my description of the supper-table will be accounted for, when I confess that I did not remain in the room but for a few moments. I felt that my time was too precious to be wasted in eating and drinking, duties which I faithfully performed three times every day, and I soon returned to the dancing-hall. It did not seem to me that I had been there long before Mrs. Robinson came sailing up to me. My heart sank, for fear she was intending to ask me to accompany her home; but, to my relief, she said—

"I am sorry to leave you so promiscuously, my dear; but I am very much fatigued, and must tell you good-night."

"Is it late?" asked I.

"It is only about twelve, so I won't ask you to go with me. Tom will wait for you, and Major Dillon will take good care of you."

The major bowed, and I remarked that I was sorry she should have tired herself so early, and surprised, too, as she had not been dancing.

"But, my dear, I have been galloping up and down the room; and, if I had been pressed in a precipice, I could not feel more weary." And she disappeared from my sight among the throng of dancers, who had again filled the floor.

Virginia soon became too much fatigued to dance also; but she very considerably seated herself in a quiet corner, where I could not see her, and therefore should not be induced to leave on her account. But, between one of the changes of the quadrilles, as I was promenading round the room with Major Dillon, I discovered her sitting pale and patient, but very sleepy. I flew up to her, and asked her if she thought we had not better go home. This was an instance of great self-denial on my part, which I hope the sympathizing reader will appreciate. She thought we had, and appealed to Major Dillon, who was also looking a little under the influence of Morpheus. He pulled out his watch, an immense silver one, and observed that it was nearly three. Obeying that gentle intimation, with reluctant steps and backward-looking eyes, I followed Virginia to the dressing-room.

And so ended my first and last ball; for the sake of which, and from the recollection of the almost unalloyed pleasure I derived from it, I have never been able to sympathize with the denunciations of many good people against dancing. There may be, and doubtless are, some good objections to it; but I know, by my own experience, that it is possible to extract the honey and leave the poison untouched.

AUTHENTIC PARTICULARS OF ALARMING DISTURBANCES CONSEQUENT ON THE LATE MEN'S RIGHTS CONVENTION AT ———.

BY CHERICOT.

We hasten to lay before our readers a correct account of a terrible excitement among the ladies, caused by the imprudent and impolitic demonstrations of hostility made by the other sex at their late convention in the city of ———. Vague rumors of an alarming character have reached us, from time to time, since that occurrence, for, though a strange and ominous calm prevailed after the sudden and stormy dispersion of the meeting, it was well known to many that the women held continual and secret councils together, from which, events of a startling nature might be expected to result.

We now present to the public the letters and report of our correspondent as they have successively reached us by telegraph, trusting that the disastrous consequences he seems to anticipate may yet be averted by timely and proper concessions on the part of the gentlemen.

June 1st, 1852, 10 o'clock A. M.

DEAR SIR: When I sent to you, in April, a detailed account of the Men's Rights Convention in this place, I privately expressed to you my fears that the gentlemen in question were acting very unadvisedly in thus hastily and openly defying their ruling powers. The nature of the resolutions passed at that meeting, the coercive measures suggested and approved, and the angry feelings displayed in the inflammatory speeches then and there delivered, must, to a reflecting and unbiassed mind, appear sufficient cause for the great excitement now prevailing among the injured ladies. An outbreak is momentarily anticipated, as the town is crowded with the irritated wives and female connections of the offending parties, and agitating and terrible anxieties are aroused when we recall the truth of the poet's beautiful saying, that

"A place not to be mentioned to ears polite knows no fury like a woman scorned."

Through the kindness of a friend in the enemy's camp, I am promised a seat at the meeting, which takes place to-morrow, consisting principally of those ladies who considered themselves personally aggrieved by the proceedings of the Men's Convention, and, though the undertaking is exceedingly perilous, as I can expect no mercy should I be discovered, I cheerfully brave the danger in the hope of being able to send you a correct report of all that transpires on this interesting occasion.

I am, etc.

CHERICOT.

6 o'clock P. M.

The panic continues to increase, and many of the male inhabitants are precipitately leaving the place, terrible alarm having arisen from the sudden disappearance of all the gentlemen who compromised themselves so seriously at the late Convention. Their wives and relatives have been questioned, but positively refuse to give any information respecting them, and imagination dares not dwell on their probable fate. As most of them were delegates to the Democratic Convention, and it was supposed that our brave and distinguished countryman, General Bluster, had a fair chance of being nominated for the Presidency, you may have a faint idea of the prevailing consternation. How will all this end? What will, what can become of the Democratic Platform if its strongest props are thus suddenly torn away? I pause for a reply.

June 2d, 1852.

No further discoveries having been made last evening, I deferred writing again until I could transmit you a full and authentic account of this day's proceedings, which have been even more exciting and interesting than I expected.

The ladies met at 10 o'clock this morning in Independence Hall, when the house was called to order, and a nominating committee appointed, which reported the following persons to be officers of the convention:—

President, Mrs. H. P. Husband; Vice-Presidents, Mrs. G. W. P. H. I. R. Powhatan, Mrs. Cotte Bettie, Mrs. Easyled, Mrs. Sucker; Secretaries, Mrs. Hoosier, Mrs. Buckeye, Mrs. Bluster, and Miss Pattie Prettywhim.

The meeting being organized, the President, Mrs. H. P. Husband, proceeded to read an introductory address:—

"Ladies, the object of this meeting is not only to vindicate and maintain our rights, but also to notice more particularly the insulting and infamous attempts to subvert our liberties made in the very place where we have now met to assert our privileges. I propose to read an account of the disgraceful proceedings to which I allude, and shall then offer such remarks as the subject suggests, trusting your enlightened wisdom will lead you to reflect on our most hazardous position, and that the result of your deliberations will be the proposal of an effectual remedy for our unheard-of wrongs."

(Here Mrs. Husband read an account of the Men's Rights Convention, as reported in our April number, which was received with groans, hisses, and cries of "shame! shame!")

Mrs. Husband continued: "If your feelings generally, ladies, are so affected by this unprovoked assault, what must be the emotions of those among us who are connected by the closest ties with the prime-movers of those seditious measures!

"Thank Heaven! I am a strong-minded woman, and can survive the disgrace; and, had the three unfortunate Mrs. Wumenheyters also been (as I could devoutly wish) strong-minded women, they might have been living to grace this assembly in defiance of their cruel persecutor. He, however, has lived to be punished for his misdeeds, if woman's wit and woman's will can compass it.

"As for Mr. Husband, I can excuse him. You know, ladies, 'no man is a hero to his wife.' He is a harmless sort of person; easily managed, unless he gets into the hands of bad advisers. It shall be my business to see that he does not again offend, and that he makes proper apologies to you all for his misconduct. In reference to the sublime object that now occupies us, I have some remarks to offer, to which I invite your indulgent attention.

"The history of woman, from creation to the present time, has been a sorrowful record of tyrannical oppression. Meek and submissive under the most dreadful wrongs; self-denying and self-sacrificing for the sake of those who do not appreciate her virtues, she has been a spectacle at which 'a world might weep.' Look at the events of past ages! Behold Eve, our first mother, who, because of an act of the most sublime disinterestedness, has been a mark for the scorn and aversion of her posterity; for why did she partake of the forbidden fruit? Ladies, she saw Adam dying for it, without the courage to taste; and, like a true woman, for his sake assumed the responsibility, and meekly bore the blame; while, faithful to the instincts of his sex, he accused her to shield himself. When Lot's curiosity to know what was passing at Sodom was overpowered by his fear of the consequences, did not his faithful wife gratify it, and bear the penalty? But why multiply such cases? The records of woman teem with them, and it is superfluous to recur to them. The time has arrived to define our position, to redress our wrongs, establish our rights, and make our declaration of independence before the world. If all men are created free and equal, we are created their superiors; and as they seem, through our own blamable supineness, to have doubted the fact, it is time to make them know it."

Mrs. Powhatan, a languid-looking, graceful lady, said, in a listless tone: "As my health is very delicate, I must beg the ladies to pardon my remaining seated while I make a few remarks. My nerves are in such a state that I really could not have undertaken to travel so far North, greatly as I sympathize with the important object you have in view, if I had not wished to show my sex and the world at large what a thorough contempt I have for Mr. Powhatan and his assertions. It was with many misgivings that I permitted him to attend the Men's Convention, and I expressly stipulated that he was to say nothing derogatory to me or the ladies of Virginia. As he has thought proper to abuse my condescension by describing us as mere machines, I must assert solemnly that we are at least the motive power which keeps the domestic and political economy in activity. The only truth he told was the facts of our belonging to the very first family in Virginia, our royal descent, and our aristocratic connections. I am proud to add that our cousin, Queen Victoria, sets us an example worthy of imitation in her management of her husband. Let us benefit by it." Here Mrs. Powhatan sank back with a sigh of exhaustion, and resigned herself to the care of her attendants, one of whom supported her head, another rubbed her feet, a third fanned her, and a fourth held a smelling-bottle to her nose.

Mrs. Easyled, of Tennessee, remarked "that she had not come here to vindicate herself from the aspersions cast upon her by her husband, for in truth she was little in the habit of regarding anything he said. In fact, he had shown his docility in acknowledging her legitimate authority, and she thought he deserved some commendation for opposing Dr. Singleman's sanguinary intentions. One plain inference from the men's proceedings was that we had allowed them too much liberty, and are now suffering the effects of that indulgence. Dr. Singleman was a crabbed old bachelor, and, as his remarks proved, very green; but what else could be expected from the State of Vermont? She wished to take this opportunity of acknowledging the gratitude of the ladies to Horace Greeley, of the 'New York Tribune,' for the interest he had shown in their cause, and the obloquy he had endured for his adherence to it. He could afford, she thought, to disregard the invidious reflections on his costume, for all present would agree with her that his old white hat covered more brains than all the black ones at the late convention." (Great applause, and universal cries of assent.)

Several ladies now arose at once to address the meeting, and much disturbance ensued; but quiet was at length restored, and Mrs. Buckeye allowed to speak, which she did as follows:—

"Our attention, I think, ought to be principally directed to the melancholy truth that, while men enjoy all the pleasures of life, we have all the pains except champagne, which they keep entirely for their own use. Whilst we drudge at home, ministering to their whims and caprices in the menial capacities of cooks, housemaids, and nurses, they lounge in their stores and offices, smoking and chewing tobacco, or, worse still, imbibing lager beer and consuming Dutch cheese and pretzels. All offices of omolument are appropriated by them; the privileges of the ballot-box are theirs alone; the bar, the pulpit, and, until lately, the medical profession, are theatres of action where woman has no right to play her part. I ask, is this to be borne? Are we to continue to yield to our tyrants, or, by bold, vigorous, and concerted measures, throw off the yoke, declare our freedom, and compel them to change situations with us? I am aware some of our own sex are so degenerate as to oppose this sublime movement; faint, weak, timid, without the courage to follow our example, they are influenced by the hired and venial press, which is constantly attacking us. They ask how, with our fragile frames and constitutions, we shall endure the labor and hardship of many of the occupations pursued by men? We answer that we have never contemplated such folly, we intend only to superintend those operations, while the men, as heretofore, do all the hard and dirty work. One lady inquires why she should go to the polls, when she controls seven votes by remaining at home? Miserable sophistry! Why shouldn't she go to the polls and give the eighth vote herself?"

Mrs. Bluster said: "I reckon everybody knows what trouble I've had with the General, and how I can't take my eyes off him a minute, without his sneakin' away and gettin' me into a scrape. Before the wimmen got up this here notion of our rights, I had kinder sorter made up my mind to keep him at home altogether to nurse the children, and do up chores; but now I'm determined on it, and nothin' sha'n't stop me. Now 's the time or never, as Mrs. Buckeye says, for us to have a vote and take our turn in grabbin' the spiles of office. Look what a state of sin and misery things is in. The post-office is delivered to the males, the chiefs of all the bureaux is men instead of wimmen; and what 's the consequence? We can't draw nothin' out of 'em. They don't even give us the Home Department. My idee is, we should call ourselves independent right away, run up a platform without no compromise, jine together, seize all the men, lay heavy duties on 'em, and keep 'em under Domestic Protection." (Hear, hear, and shouts of approbation resounded from all parts of the house.)

Mrs. Sucker, a pallid lady, shaking so with the ague she could scarcely speak, said: "Sucker told the men I hadn't the spirit of a mouse. Well, maybe I ha'n't; any how, I've got enough to manage him. I'm thankful to say he 's got the ager himself, and if he ever gits well he 'll find I'm off, and,

If I am allus shakin',
I'll never be taken.

I think, like Mrs. Bluster, that we had oughter to have a platform, and stand no nonsense on it."

Mrs. Hoosier remarked "that she felt terrible bad at standin' up to speak afore so many folks, as it was what she wan't by no means used to, but she reckoned it would feel easier after a while, as she meant to talk whenever she got a chance. Wimmen was so trampled upon that they hadn't never got to stand up for their rights; but she was thankful sich things was a comin' to an end, when they could run their lengths without bein' put a stop to. Hoosier had riled her considerable by what he said at that 'ere foolish meetin', and for the sake of her gals as was a shootin' up fast, she was goin' to make a report of her sentiments, and blow away the nonsense he had filled people's ears with. Tharfor, she 'd speak out plain, and tell 'em that in futur' he and the boys was to do all the work in the cabin and out of it; oorn dodgers and cracklins was to be his business; and she and the gals had nigh calkerlated to try the shootin' and fishin.' She wanted just to say that she, for one, was a goin' to take a stand on that 'ere platform with the rest on 'em, and never git off of it till she stepped into a office."

Mrs. Whittle now came forward, and made the following eloquent oration:—

"Placed as I am in a most unprecedentedly-painful position by the remarkably-singular proceedings of Mr. Whittle; heart sensitive, when I transcendently reflect upon the tremendously-important consequences the soul-enlightened deliberations of this wonderfully-illuminated assemblage of supernaturally-informed females are, morally speaking and intellectually thinking, likely to have upon the cloud-obscured and black-pennumbrated future, I must entreat the intense sympathy and mild-cheering indulgence of my hearers to my faint-whispered utterance of the upward aspirations and ascending scintillations of my earth-clogged spirit. Soaring in the blue ether of full-expansive thoughts, bathing the pinions of my mounting-heavenward intelligence in the balm-redolent atmospheres of—of—a—a—" (here Mrs. Whittle, who had got so high up that she didn't exactly see her way clear to the earth again, let herself down in a furious dissolving flood of tears, which carried resistlessly away the deep sympathies of the audience.) "Oh! sisters of my soul," sobbed she, when she had picked up the thread of her ideas, "worldly language fails to express the high-exalted point at which I am upward tending! Let, then, my appropriately-offered apology be that, when earnest discussing the elevating, heart-subduing cause of our down-trodden sex, the ever-running, overflowing emotions of my pent-up bosom must find sorrowful vent in an up-springing fountain of wild-despairing tears. Mr. Whittle's homely designation of what he terms the appropriate sphere of our etheralized sex must be soul-aborrent to you and anger-inspiring to me. What! shall we, the refined intelligences of this earthly planet, be made to be debase our towering aspirations, and be ignominiously forced to extricate from soilful adherence the tear-exciting New-England-beloved vegetable, vulgarly yelegt onion? Shall our delicate digitals, heaven-destined to nobler purposes than mind-debased man can comprehend, be employed in the contemptible conglomeration of snow-white farina, sparkling-pure water, and the golden-colored product of the cow, to produce crust? Shall our fair arms, instead of being upward-flung in frantic grief at our unheard-of, Heaven-resented wrongs, be moved to and fro in the assiduous combination of discordant materials, squash pie called? Forbid it, maternal earth! forbid it, shuddering skies! forbid it, horror-struck, yawning nature!" (Here the yawns of the audience, in audible sympathy with nature, gave Mrs. Whittle a hint to curb her transports.) "Friends of my heart!" she continued, "partners of my lofty hopes, I will but request your serious-composed attention to a few additional observations, and then I shall cease to weary your angelic, Job-like, Moses-meek patience. I would ask if any among you have perused the wonderful revelations made in now-revolving times from the spiritual-immaterial-intangible world to the benighted dwellers in this orb terrene? Have you, beloved partakers of my destined crusade against tyrannous men—have you, I ask, heard the most inconceivable revealings of the life led by our happy sex in the radiant sphere of Venus, that brightest planet in heaven's darkly, deeply, beautifully blue vault? Some pitying spirit, weeping briny tears over the deserted desolation of women here below, tells us that: 'Venus has a truly republican form of government. On this beautiful planet tyranny and oppression are unknown; here the sexes are on an equal footing. Women go to the polls and vote, and can also hold offices under government. The consequence is that they are more strong-minded and intelligent than the females of your mundane sphere.'"

"Now, sister spirits, will you not emulate this starry example? Will you not even excel it, and, instead of low abasing yourselves to the ignoble level of your Nicotian-weed-loving, alcohol-imbibing Neros, soar far above them into the limitless infinitude of transcendental etheralization, alighting on the Mont Blanc summit of exalted wisdom, and stern-compelling them lowly to bow to the severe castigation of their horror-inspiring, past-mind-conceiving criminality?"

With this sublime climax, Mrs. Whittle put a period to her eloquence, and, unable, after such a feast of reason, and such a flow of soul, to descend to meaner things, the meeting adjourned until nine o'clock to-morrow. The friend who procured me access to this Convention assures me that the interesting orator's florid wealth of language was acquired during a recent visit to England, where she was in constant association with the sublimely-incomprehensible poetess, Lady Emeline Stuart Wortly, and the world-renowned Thomas Carlyle. She also informs me that no one appears to understand Mrs. Whittle since her return home but Mr. Emerson. We hope, therefore, that distinguished personage will do his fair friend the justice to translate her speech for the benefit of your readers.

Up to this hour, nothing has been heard of the missing gentlemen.

Four o'clock in the afternoon.

Shortly after the transmission of my last report, a great crowd collected around the mayor's office, in consequence of a rumor that some startling discoveries had been made, and, on inquiry, I heard that a little boy had left a note at the police station, and then precipitately retreated. The missive in question bore the signature of General Boanerges Bluster, who stated that he had been put in bodily fear by the awful threats of his wife, who had kept him locked up two days on a diet of bread and water. He pathetically appealed to his fellow-citizens for help, emphatically heading his eloquent application with "Democrats, to the rescue!" Such a powerful sensation was created that it was with difficulty the crowd could be prevented rushing en masse to the assistance of the imprisoned martyr. A detachment of police was sent to the designated place (one of our principal boarding-houses), and here, after some opposition from the landlady (who is evidently in league with the enemy), the stairs were ascended, and the attic, where the brave hero of Indian Wars was confined, pointed out. But an unexpected obstacle presented itself in the shape of a young Miss of fourteen, who was posted on the landing-place as sentinel, and who obstinately refused admission to the police. Reluctant to use force, the officer resorted to persuasion.

"My little dear," pleaded he, "let us pass."

"Don't fawn upon me," retorted the spirited young lady; "my name's Amandy Malviny Fitz-allan Bluster, and mar put me here to keep par 'is and everybody else out, and I'm just a goin' to do it," brandishing a pair of scissors in such alarming juxtaposition to the officer's face that he was fain to retreat some steps from the juvenile jailer. At this crisis, the door slightly opened, and, with heroic disregard of self, the pale face of the brave Bluster appeared, and his trembling voice exclaimed, "Take care on yourselves, folks; she's a vinomous little reptyle, and would as lieve kill you as look at you. Ta'n't no use tryin' it without the military—" (Here Miss Amandy Malviny made such a decided demonstration at the door that it shut suddenly, while the police retreated, in a disorderly manner, down stairs, without any regard to precedence.) The town is in a tumult, and no one seems to know how to act. The sheriff ordered out the military, but they refused to parade, on the ground that it was not right to face the ladies. The mayor has called a meeting of the city councils, and they are now in secret session with closed doors.

9 o'clock in the evening.

The mayor and councils have just published a placard, announcing that they hold it to be their duty to consult the safety of the many in preference to that of the few, and they will, therefore, not interfere, but let the women manage their own business. The public is exhorted to remain tranquil and await the course of events, which an Irish citizen has just assured the crowd means, "if you can't be aisy, be as aisy as you can."

June 3d, 1852.

The Convention was called to order by the President, and, on motion of Mrs. Buckeye, a committee of five was appointed to draw up a Declaration of Independence.

Mrs. Cotte Bettie then stood up on the platform, and introduced to the notice of the meeting an Indian squaw wrapped in a scarlet blanket, who signified her wish to say a few words.

"Ei-no-moor-den-u, or Little Gray Mare, has come to sing in the ears of her pale-faced sisters that what they do is very good. Waw-tu-no-how-te-mata is great brave, has many scalps in the wigwam, brings Little Gray Mare much venison and buffalo hump, plenty to eat, very good; but Big Bulldog lazy, very; make squaw draw water, pound hominy, hoe corn, sow moccasin, and carry papoose. Ei-no-moor-den-u give Waw-tu-no-how-te-mata plenty fire-water, him sleep strong, tie him tight, run away, never go back no more, but stay and help her pale-face sisters tie their braves tight."

The squaw modestly moved aside, and, when the applause with which her speech was received had somewhat subsided, Mrs. Cotte Bettie expressed herself greatly delighted with the untalented eloquence and simple sagacity of their Indian sister, and thought they might all profit by her suggestions. Indeed, it might now be acknowledged that they had anticipated some of her ideas, as the actors in the late gross assault upon their privileges had most of them been secured. She congratulated her audience on the good effects which had already resulted from this bold stroke against their husbands, for it had terrified the rest of their foes into a declaration of non-intervention, which she hailed with delight as an omen of good days coming. She could affirm that the dawn of woman's restoration to her rights was hourly growing brighter in the horizon of Delaware, and she had little doubt that the next Presidential election would take place with female candidates. The happily stringent laws of her native State—its whipping-posts and stocks—offered every facility towards completing the conquest of the men, and effecting the female millennium. She would only add that, before the members of the Convention separated for their different homes, Mr. Cotte Bettie, with the other prisoners, would be brought before them, when they would publicly apologize for their misdemeanor.

Mrs. Tabitha Higgins said: "I hadn't calkerlated to say a word at this meetin', bein' as I'm a widdier, and done with all my own troubles, but I've always made it a pint to look after other people's business, so I came here to see what you was about, and I've really been quite took aback by one thing, which is that none of you ha'n't never spoke a word about the very worst of the men's doins—I mean the way they keep their secrets all to thomselves, so that we can't get a inklin' of 'em. It's unknown what I suffered while my husband was alive, cause he wouldn't never tell me nothin', and dear, dear (here Mrs. Higgins wiped her eyes), no one can tell what trouble it's give me since because it's too late to make him. What a blessed thing it would have been for me if you'd got up this notion of our rights sooner; but I suppose it wasn't to be, so I'll just give you a hint to take warning and not to let 'em off by no means till they tell you everything. Fust, I want to know the Mason's secret about buildin' up their lodges, which I think oughter be free to all the women, and hereafter grand mistresses and no masters, which will make sure that what's done under roofs will be told on house-tops. Next, it's high time to be even with the Odd Fellows, and give independent orders to the I. O. O. F.s to mind their Ps and Qs, which they must obey to the letter. I'm doubtful scrupulous about the Sons of Temperance; but I guess the Daughters of Temperance will take care of them; so they're safe enough. I hope this meetin' won't take offence at my puttin' in my word, for it makes me feel a deal comfortable to discharge my duty and report my ideas, which I hope 'll flash convincin' on your mind, and lighten your proceedin's."

Mrs. Higgins had, indeed, made such a strong impression on the feelings of her audience, that an immediate and unanimous vote of thanks was made to her, by acclamation, for recalling to the recollection of the Convention a duty which had been so unaccountably forgotten and neglected. A committee was instantly appointed to remedy this omission, and to concert measures for accomplishing the wishes of the curious Mrs. Tabitha Higgins.

Mrs. Husband read the following letter from Mrs. Bowiekknife, of Texas:—

DEAR FRIENDS: I deeply grieve that distance divides us, and prairies roll between, while running rivers racing to the ocean hinder the accomplishment of my heart's desire, which would be to share your perils in your glorious onslaught on the dastard oppressors of our sex. But I shall fly to you on the wings of fancy, and, in imagination, imbibe the outpourings of your spirits, which I doubt not will be full of intoxicating eloquence. Accept my dearest sympathies, and the assurance of my ardent attachment to the cause. I regret to say I must warn the Convention to place no confidence in Mr. Bowie-knife, who is a gay deceiver, for Texas is by no means so pleasant a place as he represents it to be; besides which, his heart and arms are mine, as his lawful wife, and he had no business to offer them to other people: but I know you will properly reprove his impertinence. Mrs. Placer, of California, who is on a visit to me, desires me to say that, if you can catch her husband, she has not the least objection to your trying a halter on him, as she wants to get out of the noose of matrimony.

Ever yours, BELINDA BOWIEKNIFE.

The next letter that was read was from Mrs. Pinckney, of South Carolina, who expressed herself deeply mortified at Mr. Pinckney's course in the Men's Convention, and the manner in which he had compromised himself and her. If the ladies of Carolina were obliged to secede from union with the gentlemen of that and the other Southern States represented by Mr. Pinckney, it would be entirely his fault, as the extreme measures proposed by him forced them, in self-defence, to nullify his acts. As to the fugitive women's bill, it was easier passed than executed; and, should Congress attempt to enforce it, she wished them, and all other pursuers of their oppressed sex, "short shoes and long corns."

This sentiment was responded to with three cheers by the excited ladies, after which Mrs. Patrick O'Dougherty, of St. Louis, addressed them in a rich and racy brogue.

"I think shame of that craythur Pathrick for makin' sich an omadhawn of himself at the Men's Convintion, talkin' and spachefyin' about his Molly Astore and his Cruiskeen Lann. He'd better not let me catch him wid ailer of 'em. Sure, when he's got the drink in, the wit's out; and that's the rasin the craythur compared the likes of us wid an Irish pig, for he very well knows that pigs have a dale finer time of it than wimmen. So plaise ye, ladies, not to mind his blarney, for sure he's a deceiver, and Biddy O'Dougherty (that's meself) wouldn't cry her eyes out if he was under the sod, where it's wishin' he was I am. Any how I'll take my lave on him, and stand right forinist him on that platform you're goin' to rare up, and then we'll see how he does be gettin' on all alone by himself, with his frind and pitcher."

Miss Patty Prettywhim, a lively adolacious beauty of eighteen, attired in a bewitching Bloomer costume, which displayed to advantage her sylph-like form and small feet, now bounded on the stand, and, in gay tones, addressed the assembly:—

"If the ladies will excuse my inexperience, I will just give them my opinion on the cause which has brought us together, and I hope my youth will not detract from the soundness of my advice, for really

I flatter myself I am quite forward for my years. This meeting, I believe, is for the purpose of enforcing our rights and subduing the men, which, so far as I am concerned, is quite useless, for I assure you, ladies, I never had any trouble in making them all do as I like." (Here Miss Patty tapped her boot with her cane, and with a saucy smile continued:) "In fact, their conquest is easy, for, after all, they are harmless creatures, and soon managed when you know the secret. Ladies, I'll tell it to you in four words—'flatter them, and feed them;'" and, with a merry air, Miss Patty sprang from the platform and ensconced herself in the crowd, where loud cries of "conceited chit," and "vain flirt," proved that her suggestions had not been very graciously received, which, however, did not seem to disconcert her in the least, as she walked carelessly whistling to the door, where Mr. Brass Blackstone took her arm and accompanied her home.

The Committee on the Declaration of Independence now reported the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:—

Resolved, That, in the course of human events, it has become necessary for woman to untie the Gordian knot that binds her to the will of man, and to assume the exalted station assigned her by the provisions of Nature and the law of right.

Resolved, That we hold these truths to be self-evident, that woman was created superior to man, and that she is endowed with certain inalienable rights, the most important of which is the right to her own way.

Resolved, That, to secure the liberty of doing as she likes, she is perfectly justified in rebelling against the despotism that would curb her reasonable desires.

Resolved, That woman has hitherto chosen rather to suffer than to assert her natural superiority to her tyrant, man; but it is now her right, her duty, to throw off her trammels and declare herself free.

Resolved, That man has engrossed every privilege, and forbidden her any pleasure; that, while he frequents clubs, theatres, and other places of public amusement, woman must stay at home and work for him.

Resolved, That he considers woman to have no part in her own property nor in his, and that he has acted on the principle that, "what's yours is mine, and what's mine is my own," which compels woman, in her own defence, to hold on to all she can get.

Resolved, That he reserves to himself the right of suffrage, thus preventing woman from righting her suffering.

Resolved, That he monopolizes all offices and all the emoluments thereof, yet constantly complains when woman puts her hand in his pockets.

Resolved, That he holds woman's patience to be a virtue that is to be always tried, never found wanting, yet never rewarded.

Resolved, That, as a lover, he exalts woman above the stars, while, as a husband, he conceives her mission to be a descent into the kitchen; that he expects her to sew on his buttons and darn his hose; yet never permits her to wear out his old clothes.

Resolved, That woman will never be properly appreciated until she thinks more of herself, and that this long train of abuses renders female emancipation immediately necessary, to effect which desirable result woman must make herself master of man.

Resolved, That though man may be physically stronger, he is morally weaker than woman, and may, therefore, be easily subdued through this weakness, and frightened into submission by prompt and energetic measures.

Resolved, Therefore, that we hereby publish and declare that we are and ought to be of right free and independent; that we are absolved from all obedience to our tyrant man; that we have full power to vote, hold offices, use our own money, levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things that we may think proper, to which we pledge ourselves, in spite of our husbands and all the men in the world.

Mrs. Husband made a speech on the foregoing resolutions, and concluded with saying: This, ladies, is the glorious assertion of our rights; the stupendous platform on which we take our stand, and, should it ever be overthrown, may we be buried in its ruins! But that can never happen, for it will become firmer as ages roll away, and our female posterity will bless us for having reared it. I grieve that I must now recall your attention to meaner things, as the offenders against our dignities are in an adjoining room, awaiting your leisure to receive their concessions. I shall now, with your permission, have them brought in.

The President whispered to some of the ladies near her, who left the hall and presently returned with the crestfallen gentlemen, who, as their names were called, successively came forward.

Mr. H. P. Husband, as he prepared to address the ladies, cast a timid glance at the President, who, in rather an audible tone, bade him "not to make a fool of himself," which doubtless caused the extreme nervousness that characterized his demeanor during the following speech:—

"It is my intention, ladies, to say a few words only, for I have not the indelicate wish to make a vain display on this occasion. I know that my fate will meet with sympathy from my fellow-men, and that my efforts in the noble and just cause of their rights will, by them, be duly appreciated.

"With them I leave my memory, my sentiments, and my acts, proudly feeling that they need no vindication from me this day. The liberty of man has been my fatal dream."

"Well, my dear," interposed Mrs. Husband, "it's time to wake up from it, for we can't stay here all day and listen to you; so make your apology at once."

The disconcerted gentleman muttered some words which could not be distinguished, and made a hasty retreat. (We would draw the attention of the reader to the fact that Mr. Husband seems to have an intense admiration of the Irish patriot Meagher, as, in the above address, he has adopted both his words and his ideas, and doubtless, if not interrupted, would have given the public the whole of that gentleman's speech when arraigned before the British tribunal. Perhaps, however, it is no plagiarism, but merely a singular coincidence.)

Mr. Wumenheyter, after much resistance, was finally forced to the front of the platform, where he reluctantly confessed that, of all the humbugs peculiar to New York, he was the greatest.

Mr. Pinckney seceded from his seditious sentiments, and apologized to the assembly for his aspersions and assaults.

Mr. Whittle promised "to stay to hum in futur, and never be such a right-on-end fool as to meddle with the women."

Mr. G. W. P. H. I. R. Powhatan was compelled to come forward; but, as he would not condescend to apologize, he was taken back till his pride should have a fall.

Dr. Singleman promised henceforth to torture his own patients, and not to try the patience of the ladies.

Mr. Easyled said it was a pleasure to submit to his wife and make concessions to the ladies. He begged to offer them his congratulations on the independence they had this day achieved; but here Mrs. Easyled ordered him to mind his own business and get out of the way, which command he promptly obeyed.

Mrs. Hoosier mentioned that she had left Hoosier at home to mind the cabin; but he told her to say that he begged all their pardons.

Mrs. Sucker stated that Sucker had the fever and ager, and couldn't come, but she'd answer for his peaceableness.

Mrs. Husband explained that they couldn't produce Captain Salt, as he was off on a whaling voyage; but, if they could catch him on his return, he would assuredly be tarred and feathered. She would also observe that, if Mr. Placer had not been among the missing, it would have been a pleasure to comply with his wife's request, and hang him.

Mr. Cotte Bettie said that the fact he had asserted on a late occasion, that "Delawarians were true Blue, that they always were and always would be Blue," must now be his justification to the ladies—as he could not have been so rash as to offend them had he not been very blue indeed.

Mr. Bowieknef entreated the ladies to pardon him if he had offended, and deprecated their being prejudiced against him and Texas by the misrepresentations of his wife. He could assure them his love was extended enough to embrace her and all of them.

Mrs. O'Dougherty informed the Convention that "Patrick, the craythur, was so overcome by the sperit that he could naythur walk nor spake; but she'd kape him from evermore spiting them."

General Bluster was carried forward by Mrs. Bluster, who supported him in her arms while he said: "I'm quite riled at myself for givin' Mrs. Bluster and the rest on you all this trouble, and I reckon I won't never do it agin. I'll gin up all politics and offices. I'll let the Democratic platform hold itself up, and the milentary git another general. I'll stay at home and never make no more speeches till Mrs. Bluster runs for President, when I'll stump for her through all Kaintack." The general wanted to say more, but Mrs. Bluster carried him off; the other gentlemen retreated, and the Convention adjourned sine die.

COUGHT A MARRIED WOMAN TO HOLD PROPERTY?*

"Why should not females be instructed in their social rights, and in the means of preserving what is their own? and why should they be so deprived of the benefit of knowing that they can protect themselves against the barbarism of laws, which crept into the social system when they were slaves?"—WM. SULLIVAN.

"While as the silly owner of the goods
Weeps over them, and wrings his hapless hands,
And shakes his head, and, trembling, stands aloof,
While all is shared, and all is borne away,
Ready to starve, and dares not touch his own."

SHAKESPEARE.

"I had been taught to reverence the law as a sort of earthly Providence, as the great popular sovereign, the unthroned and sceptreless prince, the mild dictator, whose province it was to see that not a single subject of its sway received harm. Protection against the law—protection against the protector."—EDWARD EVERETT.

"Je ne suis pas de ceux que disent, le n'est rien,
C'est une femme qui se noie,
Je des que c'est beaucoup, et ce sexe vaut bien,
Que nous le regretton pulesqu'il fait notre joie."

LA FONTAINE.

"It is bad policy to depreciate women. I would sooner teach them to overvalue than to undervalue themselves; so long, at least, as they are our companions for life, and the mothers of our children. We all act according to our own standard of self-estimation; and the more sensitive we are, the more are we influenced in our behavior by the opinions of others concerning us. Women are more sensitive than we, and therefore more at the mercy of opinion. It is women, after all, who form our characters."—BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

At first view, one might imagine moral rules unnecessary to well-meaning people; that the impulses of a benevolent heart might be safely trusted for just views and prompt performance of the social duties; but we are taught in time, by our own cruel blunders, and those of others, to thank Heaven that it has not left us, with our own limited views of the consequences of actions, to decide upon measures according to their apparent character; that, since nothing less than a vast and altogether unattainable extent of observation and experience would constitute us accurate judges of general expedience, there has been conferred upon us the most precious of all gifts, a set of infallible rules that mark out our path—a code that, by its authority, guides the ingenuity which, left to itself, finds often as many arguments for the wrong as for the right. The records of our race testify how often, by not borrowing this light divine, even the well-meaning have gone astray. Much woe has arisen from mistaken humanity. We learn of the laws of morality, that to be unhallowed policy which tolerates what is wrong because it appears to be beneficial. Ignorant moralists have practised religious persecution. Ignorant moralists have attempted to show that private vices are public benefits. Ignorant moralists have exposed children and aged persons.

It was unconscious ignorance of legal obligations which, as we believe, permitted Dr. Cooper to censure the legal protection granted to women from the oppressive laws depriving them, after marriage, of their property. "In Great Britain," he says (Cooper's "Justinian"), "the courts, as I think, instead of looking with a jealous eye upon every kind of pre-contract that tends to impair the unity of interest between married people, and the dependence of the wife upon the husband, have leaned somewhat too strongly in favor of pre-contract by marriage settlements, trust estates, testamentary powers to be exercised by the wife, and by enforcing equivalent settlements on the receipt, after marriage, of a wife's property."

After turning our attention to the subject, the more we have reflected upon the moral claims of the female sex, the more we have seen of life—the more we have been amazed at Dr. Cooper's views of the subject, the more we have been surprised at * This article was written by an eminent Boston lawyer. The right of a married woman to hold property has been acknowledged and established by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, but Massachusetts is yet groping in the dark ages on this important point. Therefore, the attention of the public to this able article is requested. The advance of popular opinion is on the side of justice. Men must secure to women their rights, and then, we trust, our sex will be intent only on performing their own duties.—ED. L. B.

the undoubting approbation given by a man like him to the law divesting women of their property; approbation shown by condemning all mitigations of it. We learn, from Dr. Cooper's statement, that the law is recommended to him by the following considerations: "The natural prevalence, on the part of the husband, of mental energy, as well as of corporeal force, independent of the means of acquired knowledge—the precepts of Christianity, which have settled the subordinate situation of the wife—and civilized expedience."

These reasons appear to us to contribute but a specious support to the law. We cannot perceive the force of the argument founded on the inferiority of the sex, even if the inferiority amounted to an incapacity which would make it necessary to appoint a guardian for every woman, married or unmarried. A woman does not stultify herself by wedding; so that, if her inferiority be good cause for the interference of the law with her property, it ought to be no more at her own disposal before than after marriage; and guardianship, the only legal measure applied with propriety to incapacity, stops entirely short of the power assumed by law, which does not give in trust, but transfers. A more generous deduction from the inferiority of the female sex would be to enjoin that their fortunes should be confirmed to them by way of compensation, to insure them a consideration which they are in no danger of losing with their youth. We should not apply Dr. Cooper's inference even to the matches described in the early history of man, where beings of celestial race wedded the daughters of men, much less to those between women and the sons of women. We see no more propriety in taking away a woman's property on this ground, than in taking away the property of a man on the same, to give it to one stronger or wiser than himself. To make a law just, which should give a man the possession of his wife's property, not even incapacity on her part would suffice. To give him the administration of it, this incompetence should be proved: superior discretion on the part of women cannot confer authority which nature has denied—cannot license men to be unjust because women are imprudent.

But we do not accede to the inferiority of the female judgment as regards expenditure. Women do not handle the chisel, the pencil, or the pen as well as men; but, as a mass, they excel, in our opinion, in a wise management of expense. From habits of self-denial, and the absence of an enterprising spirit, they, we sometimes think, better "match their wants and means" than we; their sensitiveness to opinion, and the high standard of female purity, save them more generally from the expense of vicious pleasures. Their superior tenderness of heart, concentrated from their comparative seclusion on a few objects, inclines them, for the most part, to that excellent mode of expense, household good.

But, in repelling the pretence of incompetence, we fear we obscure the question, which is not whether men or women are most likely to be spendthrifts, but what is justice. Whatever a woman possesses by labor, succession, or donation, the law, upon her marriage, wrests entirely from her; yet no consideration, plainly, but an inferiority amounting to incompetence, which would make it for the best good of the wife herself, as in the case of a minor, an idiot, or a lunatic, could justify, in the eyes of those who have not adopted the opinion of Hobbes, that unlimited power confers an unlimited right, a law restraining her in any degree in the use of her property.

We cannot understand how Dr. Cooper applies the Christian precepts to the support of this law. Christ, in the only instance where he refers to the rights of the sexes, puts them on a footing with each other (Mark x. 11, 12). The Christian maxim of doing as we would be done unto, is boldly violated by the legal disadvantages which women incur in their relations with us. What man would avail himself of his legal powers to appropriate to himself his wife's property, who weighs her rights, advantages, and detriment in the same balance in which he weighs his own? We do not think it possible for the man who places himself, as Christianity requires, in the situation of the woman he marries, to make the law his guide. He would do violence to himself in not interposing to save her from its action. The man who, without self-reproach, takes the property of his wife is either deficient in proper sentiments towards her, or has not been accustomed to make that use of his imagination on which morality principally depends; he has not learned to put himself, according to the leading maxim of the Christian religion, in the place of others—to feel their feelings and apprehend their desires—to do as he would be done by. We suppose reference is had by Dr. Cooper to the apostolic precept, enjoining female subordination; but he cannot deduce correctly a right in the husband to the property of the wife from these precepts, any more than such a right in the father and ruler from the precepts enjoining filial and civil subordination.

No man believes that Paul's injunctions to children to obey their parents mean that whatever the child acquires belongs to the parents; or that his precepts of submission to the emperor imply that there was no private property in the empire. When we consider who the apostles were, when they flourished, and the condition in which they saw the female sex, we regard their unexpected liberality, so far beyond the times, with regard to women, one of the most convincing proofs that their wisdom was divine. Nothing seems to us more at variance with the laws that alienate the property of married women, than the manner in which the matrimonial relation is treated in the New Testament. The apostle says to the married pair, "Love one another:" the operation of our laws is to alienate the one from the other. The example of the tenderest love which has ever been felt on earth is held up by the apostle as a model for husbands: "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it." Sentiments are enjoined by the apostle, which would make a man shrink from exercising the liberties with regard to his wife's possessions that the law appoints. We hold, with Jeremy Taylor, that "husbands should rather be fathers than lords; that the wife not only ought by all means to please the husband, but he must by no means displease her." In fact, it appears to us that nothing can be more hostile to the Christian religion than the law we have been considering, whether we regard the duties it requires of us as men or as husbands.

As to the argument derived from civil expedience, before acquiring any weight, the practice in question must be proved innocent. Let those who, in a case of ethics, make expedience of any sort a rule of action, pause over the admirable words of Bishop Butler: "The happiness of the world is the concern of him who is the lord of it and proprietor of it; nor do we know what we are about, when we endeavor to promote the good of mankind in any way but those which he has directed."

Dr. Cooper objects to any evasion of the law, as tending to impair the unity of interest between married persons. Now, where this unity of interest subsists, there will be no difference of opinion about the use of the property belonging to either party, and, where it is unhappily wanting, no circumstance tends more to widen the division than the law he supports. Harmony of views not subsisting, what monstrous injustice that the husband's wishes should be promoted by the overthrow of the wife's, the entire privation of her property; that she, as it may be, should be devoted to penury to "gild his waste!"

From some remarks of Dr. Cooper, we perceive that he objects to the wife's retaining her property, as suggesting wrongs which such prudence provides for. He seems unable to imagine any motive to such a measure but the foresight of a divorce, and objects to any legal steps in anticipation of such an event, as weakening the public sentiment of the indissolubility of marriage. Among the causes which, in our opinion, should enforce legal security of the wife's property to herself, Dr. Cooper selects circumstances of more rare occurrence, perhaps, to show how little this protection is needed, and the most flagrant, perhaps, to heighten, by the offensiveness of the mistrust implied, the odium of the measure. However, the wrongs he names being not wholly unknown, it is no more than prudent, on the part of the lady's friends, to make the best provision they can against them. Other objections to the free course of the law, both of weight, and enjoined by circumstances of perpetual occurrence, establish still more fully the necessity of precaution, such as a husband's prodigality, rashness of speculation, alienation of the property by law from a woman's children.

Nobody would imagine, from Dr. Cooper's account of the matter, that a man's spending his wife's property was an everyday case: he seems to think that the husband partakes, without ever wasting his wife's means. Had he been at our side when we once attended, in a city of ours where bankruptcies have been frequent, one of those auctions of rapine's natural successors of the abandonment of the wife's property to the husband—those scenes which give an insight into the deep domestic wretchedness and violation of justice, wrought by the law he supports so warmly—he would have been visited with a new sense of the subject. He would have been affected as we were, we hope, in traversing the desolate apartments thrown open to the general gaze, in looking round upon the materials of domestic comfort displaced, all forfeit to this barbarous law, sofas, carpets, beds of down, the select library, the silent piano, with half-worn music books, the kitchen utensils, everything indicative of taste, past plenty, and hospitality. A friend of ours was struck to see the elegant little presents received by the wealthy bride from her young friends, counted among the property of the husband's creditors. We were more moved at the sight of the furniture of the nursery, the well-handled toys of the banished, disinherited descendants of the wealthy grandfather, whose property had bought the whole. Everything marked the stunning suddenness of the shock. There was oil remaining in the lamps, cards in the card-racks. A female friend pointed out to us the half-filled drawers of the work-table; the remains of various condiments in their appropriate receivers. Amid the melancholy scene, a Canary bird was recommending himself by his songs to a new owner. We looked mournfully around, and thought this a sorrowful sight for a well-governed country.

Could Dr. Cooper have taken a full view of the subject, in affording his support to a law which gives such an unreasonable preference to the descendants of a man through one child over those of another? The law transmits a man's property to his son, and again to the children of that son. The law transmits a man's property to his daughter also; but, instead of carrying it forward to her children, delivers it, while she yet breathes, to her husband, and divides it finally, after her death, between that wife, out of two or three, perhaps, who chances to be his survivor, and the various progeny of all his wives. A mother sometimes denies herself every luxury, even comforts, to educate and provide for her children, dies, and leaves her savings to be devoted to a new family, reminding the spectator of the rifled hive. We pity even bees who, after collecting a sweet hoard for their young, have it diverted to other mouths. We do not willingly see this economical tenderness deprived of its just satisfactions. Many an amiable woman's temper is ruined by the foresight of this injustice; for even the dove would peck her mate should he snatch from her bill the food she was hurrying to the open mouths of her young. It is not strange a woman should spend profusely, whose children are not her heirs.

For an answer to the simple question, whether an estate should remain within the family of the ancestor from whom it came, or go, according to law, to strangers, while grandchildren still survive, no one can hesitate. Some are ready to say, the moral sense of the husband will prevent this: not so, perhaps he will imagine; the predominant influence of the living wife strengthening the opinion that his duty lies the other way. Though the property inherited by a deceased mother might make a barely comfortable provision for her children, a woman married to a man enriched by his former wife, knowing the law, unless she be a woman of an upright mind, expects, and is willing to be, with her children, the heir of the property of her predecessor. These expectations a man easily persuades himself he ought not to disappoint: out of a vicious law grows a vicious morality.

We were pleased, in perusing "Redwood," with the just picture of the law drawn by such an intelligent moralist as Miss Sedgwick. It is represented as the temptation to a crime in one sister, and to reject the advantage offered by it is made the study of the other. Alas! that the law, which professes to be intended for everybody's preservation, should, in so many instances, openly sacrifice the weaker to the stronger; that the legal relations between the sexes, the highest moral interest of society, should form so affecting an exception to the touching eulogy of Hooker: "All things in heaven and earth do her homage—the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempt from her power."

Dr. Cooper writes as if he had never seen an aggression committed by a husband. We, with him, wish to see the marriage bond indissoluble. We do not agree with him as to the best means by which it is to be guarded and strengthened. We know too well how much the law he approves operates, with its degrading and unjust tendencies, to weaken the natural sentiment of conjugal affection. Our aim is to extinguish, by the abolition of this old usage, the sparks which light the implacable domestic dissensions. Domestic happiness, which forms the strength of the conjugal tie, must depend on the manner in which domestic life is constituted. Essential to it is a sentiment towards the wife which would insist on leaving her property at her own disposal. How many delightful homes have been ruined by the contrary course! How often has it deprived men of happiness in domestic life—a happiness which supplies the place of every other, but for which no other can compensate! Often has this law hardened and sundered bosoms which, had it never existed, would have been

"Each other's pillow to repose divine."

Good men and wise will aim, in their matrimonial institutions, to secure conjugal affection, and they know that the best way to preserve the union of hands is to secure the union of hearts. It is because the interests of the married pair are the same we would annul the law, which, preferring one party to the other, mars and often destroys the well-being of both. Its bitter fruits are inevitably shared by the husband. In married life, on whichever side the dissatisfaction begins, it must spread to the other. The law operated as unfavorably for Captain Byron as for Mrs. Byron, for John Wilkes as for Mary Wilkes. He who does not study his wife's happiness studies his own in vain. Which would a man choose—the "Merry heart that goes all the day,

Or the sad one that tires in a mile a?"

the ingenuous and overflowing devotion of love, or the dull and stated service of inanimate duty? This law is one of the most striking exhibitions of the ill husbandry of injustice. The uncomfortable tenure by which all property is held, acquired in a way not approved by the natural sentiments, renders the holder careless about its preservation. The law seems devised to produce idleness, and idleness produces bankruptcy. For the cruelty of its operation, it deserves as deep reprobation as a lottery. Men who marry on the present legal footing, like those who gain the dear-bought prizes of a lottery, fancy themselves with as little foundation in possession of wealth which no prodigality can exhaust. The prizes of the matrimonial lottery are often as evanescent as those of any other, and they bequeath in their passage heavier regrets. The moral sentiments are stronger than the artificial regulations of law; and the violated claims of the wife, which no institutions can annul or obliterate, but increase the sorrows of the prodigal who has spent her fortune. The eagerness with which men possess themselves of a wife's property, and the common subsequent chagrin, remind us of the mistake of Milton's fallen angels when, in the showy fruit of the grove that suddenly sprung up, bow by Pandemonium

"They, fondly thinking to allay
Their appetite with gust, instead of fruit,
Chewed bitter ashes."

A confused sense of these evils has given many men a horror of marrying a fortune: when things are placed on a just footing, we think it as advantageous to marry a rich woman as to marry a rich man; the property being left at the wife's disposal, while it is to the husband an unmixed and material benefit, is, at the same time, in the eyes of the public, no more than a reasonable and equitable advantage. The husband escapes, in such a case, the attacks of envy, and finds in his wife, instead of a discontented slave, an attached ally. He escapes also what is, in our opinion, dangerous to friendship, too heavy an obligation, and the chance of making the transference fatal to the happiness of the confiding party, a responsibility at which we should shudder. Few yet understand this. The law, by destroying in men all moderation, frequently prevents matches reciprocally eligible. If a suitor's extravagant desires for a woman's whole property are disappointed, the match is rejected, to the detriment of both parties. Inordinate expectations, that in these days would not have been received, unless suggested by the laws of barbarous times, blind a man entirely to the only mode of really enjoying a wife's property, receiving the income alone. A happy marriage is often defeated because the law holds out an advantage, illusory, because incompatible with justice and domestic happiness. The law hostile to moderation renders a man indifferent to the only solid, real benefit the nature of things allows in such a case.

We should be glad to see, by a repeal of the laws in question, the untowardness of the counteracting measures done away. There is something in this business of restitution—for so it may be called—not in harmony with the sentiments of lovers. It is one of the great objections to law, whose downward course must then be traced, that it should cause such a discordant process to mingle with the fair hopes and tender devotion of a betrothed pair.

We would annul the disagreeable necessity of this retrogressive step, by abolishing the law altogether. Perhaps to the desire of being rid of this uncomfortable warfare of the mind, is to be attributed the speech we often hear from enthusiastic young women: "Where I trust myself, I will trust my property;" as if a man might not have the amiable disposition to which they might trust themselves safely, without being possessed of any financial discretion—as if also men were unchangeable. A woman might prudently trust herself where she could not trust her property, and she might trust her property wisely where she would be very unwise to trust herself. Let men remember that, with whatever apparent willingness the bride endures the operation of the law, a sentiment is sometimes chilled by the sacrifice it makes. Women often persuade themselves that the compelled sacrifice is voluntary; but this persuasion is apt to fade away, and to be succeeded by indignation, or a cheerless, indurated passiveness. They perceive at length, and are hurt and chagrined at the ungenerous terms on which the marriage union is formed; the dimness of fancy is illumined by experience and reason—

"The beam pours in; for time and skill will couch the blind."

One of these confiding wives, desecrating the approach of poverty, was heard to say, a few years after her marriage, "I hate the name of wife!" Being accused on one occasion for negligence of her husband, she said, "I have been more sinned against than sinning." Women have been known to wish, on account of the insupportable laws to which they are subject, that they had never inherited property. One* of the English moralists takes the side of Dr. Cooper, ridiculing, with his accustomed humor, any provisionary arrangements on the part of a woman betrothed, as displaying great folly, resigning herself as she does to a man on whom she is not willing to rely wholly, and applies to such a one the phrase of "penny-wise and pound-foolish;" but, though he is of opinion that the requisite degree of regard, previous to marriage, is too confiding to seek any stipulations, he gives, by stating, at the same time, the propensity of the sex to many men who, if they even "happen to be good-natured, seem only to dissipate their fortunes," the greatest force to the considerations which recommend women to the public care.

That such plausible objections should lie against the remedy one law provides for another (as Dr. Cooper states them we were formerly influenced), impresses us more deeply with the necessity of the complete abrogation of that we complain of. "They owe their force with us and others to custom, and strongly custom blinds us"—we have exclaimed, when we have heard men really generous say, without any suspicion they were showing, by such a declaration, a much greater want of generosity than that they censured, "I would not marry a woman who would not trust me with her property." Edward Everett tells us, referring to a case, if of as much urgency as this, applying to a smaller number of powers, "that it is one of the worst effects of bad laws that they corrupt public sentiment." Such an evil necessarily exists here; for it is impossible that the principle of the law, and the principle of evading it, can both be right. It is true, as Bishop Hare says, that most men think they can do conscientiously whatever they can do legally. Men of refined, exalted understandings, who have a large compass of thought, and have looked into the principles of things, know that written laws are but deductions of the law of nature, which is prior to all human institutions; that these sometimes deviate from that unwritten law, and, when they do, are of no real intrinsic authority. "They know that a thing is not just and reasonable, because it is enacted; but, in good government, is enacted because it is just and reasonable. The generality think they can do justly whatever they may do legally."

Cities, the great torches which light the way to the rest of the community, are beginning to understand this subject. In cities, the wife's fortune now, when it is considerable, is usually confirmed to her.

* Addison's Spectator.

A father is there heavily condemned who does not secure to a daughter the property he gives her; and fathers are no longer contented to follow the lead of the law, that the real estate they expect to devise to a daughter be but a plank she can lay hold of in the wreck of all the rest. They no longer make an unfatherly difference between a daughter and a son; and they reject for their daughters the legal conditions for the transfer of their property, "necessaries, in which term are comprised, by the law, food, drink, clothing, washing, physic, instruction, and a competent place of residence." Fathers have learnt that there is no certainty that the husband will retain the ability to do this, to satisfy a claim with which by law the richest heiress must content herself, and they do not mean to give a magnificent price for a petty advantage, which is, after all, insecure.

In cases where the property is small, often valued more from that cause by the possessor, the legal injury remains everywhere in its original force. We heard a case in humble life, of peculiar hardship, detailed lately, where a seamstress had furnished comfortably, by her earnings, her two rooms; her furniture, after her marriage, disappeared article by article, sold by her profligate husband to buy liquor. The law, at one and the same time, snatched from her the reward of industry, and changed in him an unhappy propensity into a habit; his legal power of taking from his wife her tables and chairs caused her not only the loss, but impaired her just and salutary influence by placing her in a contemptible light before him, as a creature whose welfare was, in the eye of the law, of no importance. We have often regarded this law as the ally of the dram-shop and gaming-table. The little earnings of many a laundress, nurse, school-mistress, fruit-seller, and seamstress, are a common supply to the thirst of their intemperate husbands. We have known instances of a husband, absent for years at a time, sweeping into his empty pockets, on his occasional visits, the earnings of his wife in his absence. Those who know much of the state of the poor in this city will call to mind many cases of this kind.

This aiding of tyranny and profligacy by the forms of law arming them with the legitimate authority, under the shelter of which they perpetrate the most cruel wrongs, is an abuse that we wonder that good men survey with such apparent indifference. Nothing but legislative interference can bring relief to this numerous class of sufferers. The law must retrace its steps till it gets back within the moral boundaries of legislative authority.

In addition to Cooper's arguments in support of the law we have been considering, that men are stronger, wiser than women; that Heaven requires the wife to render up her property to her husband—we do not find the law in our Bible—that it is convenient she should do so; and that men will behave themselves ill if it is withheld, we have met with a few additional ones. Some say that legal assurance to the wife of her fortune is impertinent: there is a large, well-meaning class who adopt the arguments of Devorgoil, when he declares he

"Never swerved from 'his' integrity,
Save at the voice of strong necessity,
Or such overpowering view of high advantage
As wise men liken to necessity,
In strength and force compulsive."

There are others whose sole argument is that it is the custom; men who, instead of considering before they adopt a measure whether it is right or wrong, ask what the custom is. Such persons will enter upon a very exceptional course of action, and prosecute it without consciousness of blame. "Custom makes a rectitude in their eyes; they imagine that a thing must be done, and ought to be done, because it always has been done: what they never questioned in their own minds, and never heard questioned, passes for an innate principle, a self-evident truth, needing no evidence to support it, and which no evidence can overthrow." We consider this the largest class of the supporters of this oppression, because of this character are the majority of mankind. They say the law is old. We know it is old; so old, that to which branch of the northern pirates, that overspread the island from which we draw our origin, we owe this deleterious legacy we know not; but it is well ascertained that the most profound hebetude pervaded and darkened the land, when this law was adopted or devised by the illiterate swordsmen of barbarous Britain—men whose principle it was "That they should take who have the power,

And they should keep who can."

That it was enacted when law, so far from making it an object to secure the weaker individual from the violence of the stronger, was but an expression of the mere good pleasure of power. It might be expected that it should have been deposited, long since, in the graves of the sea kings: shred by shred has dropped from the English jurisprudence of the dark and barbarous times of old. We hope the reforming shears will yet lop off this part of the coarse and tattered tissue. The antiquity of a law has weight with us; but it is only of that law "which has no date," which was never enacted, which is prior to all things, coeval with eternity, the law of rectitude, that to which all other laws owe their force, and in virtue of which alone they oblige. We think it plain this later law is a most flagitious repeal of the elder.

There has been some mitigation of the state of women since the days of the heptarchy: "Dower is imagined by some the relic of a Danish custom, since, according to the historians of that country, dower was introduced into Denmark by Sweyn, the father of our Canute the Great, out of gratitude to the Danish ladies, who sold all their jewels to ransom him when taken prisoner by the Vandals." Sweyn deserves the compliment Scott puts into the mouth of Cœur de Lion, when he offers his hand to Robin Hood, and says, "There is mine, and I hold it honored by being clasped with yours. For he that does good, having the unlimited power to do evil, deserves praise, not only for the good which he performs, but for the evil which he forbears."

There is some prospect of farther changes in behalf of the sex; that the law will make the property of married, like that of unmarried women, an inviolate possession; that legislators will interfere to hinder men, in their blindness, from lacerating the left hand with the right, from doing what is as foolish and imprudent as it is unjust and cruel. There are men who distinguish between a moral and a legal right to property, who confess the unfairness of the advantage given them by law, and whose forbearing integrity towards the women they marry testifies the force of their convictions: their examples will attract attention; followers will be the reward of their virtue. As society improves, the equitable temper, which is disposed to weigh the interests of others in equal balance with our own, must become more prevalent. Does any man view this subject in a just light? Let him who knows, pities, and abhors the evil embrace that generous course of action

"Which smooths this life and wins the next."

Let him endeavor to produce that state of knowledge and feeling throughout society which will bring about legislative interference. Were once the veil withdrawn from the scenes of domestic misery, the aberrations from virtue caused by this law, its character would strike all alike against it: there is the voice of reason, the demand of offended justice, the moan of wounded domestic peace, the pang, if not the cry of outraged maternal love, and the laws of God.

LOVE'S DREAMINGS; OR, EXTRACTS FROM KATY'S DIARY.

BY HADDIS LANE.

"Love may slumber in a maiden's heart, but he always dreams."

June 31st, 184-. THE last of my school-days! Would it were the first! Would that the joys and sorrows of a school-girl's life were yet all before me, for I shall ne'er "see their like again." All the rest of the sister band have turned from that long low school-room, with gladsome, buoyant spirits and bright smiling faces, for their future is unclouded, and their hearts glowing with health and happiness; but I, a lonely orphan, with a poor purse and a heart still poorer—what has life in store for me like those sunny school-days? I have just been closeted with my guardian, a perfect icicle of a man, and he has informed me that the long-cherished dream of being an heiress is pure "stuff and nonsense;" that my little means, now that the debts are all paid, will support me, it is true, but that very barely. So that I need dream no longer of being a "lady bountiful," for "charity," in my case, will have to "begin at home." But I will not despair; I have a warm, earnest heart, and affections yearning for some dear one around whom to entwine themselves. I must love something or somebody, and my "charity" must lie in my sympathy. Then the cold worldly man showed me a letter. It was from an aunt, my only living relative. She is a very old lady, and begs me to come and live with her, to read to her, to sing for her, to nurse her in her many sicknesses, and to keep her house. Oh! if she had but said to come and love her, how would I have flown at her bidding! But this catalogue of her requirements seems very much like telling a new servant what her work is to be. However, I am to go. I must leave my dear little village, and the friends who have been so very kind to the little orphan, and take up my abode in a busy city, among total strangers, and bear with the whims and ailments of a cross old lady, for such, my guardian assures me, is the character of my aunt. I have never known what opposition is; I have lived alone in the world, with no one's pleasure to consult but my own; and how I shall stand being housekeeper, reader, musician, and nurse, Heaven only knows.

July 19th. I arrived this morning in my new home, and it certainly is a grander place than I dared to imagine. As I tripped up the steps after my guardian, my heart sank within me; but I made a heroic effort to control myself, and so well did I succeed, that not even the stately servant who obsequiously opened the door—not even the large, gloomy apartment into which he ushered us—discomposed me in the least. As my aunt had not yet made her appearance, I had leisure to look around me, and to comment upon the place. The room was damp and cold, as though it were only opened on state occasions; and the furniture, though magnificent in velvet and rosewood, would have been all the better for a good dusting. There was not a book nor a flower to be seen, and their absence is enough to make even a palace look gloomy and lonely. At one end of the room was something in a glass case. I rose to look at it, trembling at my own temerity, but not doubting to find something "rich or rare," so carefully preserved. Judge of my astonishment, when a stuffed cat met my view. Yes, a cat, mounted on a silver pedestal, on which were inscribed the virtues, sufferings, and lamentable end of poor Tabby. "If my aunt is a lover of cats," thought I, "there 'll be eternal feud between us."

At this moment, the door opened, and a very stately lady made her appearance. She was old, wofully old; but how desperately young in her dress! A rich silk, flounced to her waist, with low neck and short sleeves. Such a bony neck and skinny arms! Her fingers were loaded with rings, and her long ringlets quivered gracefully as she courted low to me. But her face, her face! Her rouge might impart brightness to her cheeks; but what could restore the lustre to that dim, gray eye? what could bring back the rubies to that pallid lip? (the pearls were the dentist's own); what art could smooth the wrinkled brow, or remove the expression of peevishness, pride, and suffering, from the countenance? I had prepared myself to throw my arms around my aunt's neck, to whisper that I would be a daughter unto her if she would but love me and bear with my faults and follies; but the idea of being a daughter to such a young thing, of begging advice and affection from such a fashionable lady, chilled me into silence, and I acknowledged her ceremonious greeting by a bow as cold. She requested us to be seated, and take some refreshment which the servant offered us. My guardian hastily swallowed a glass of wine, and, making a hurried apology, stalked out of the room, banging the door after him with such force that the room rung again. My aunt drew her chair closer to mine, and said, in a low voice, "We may as well proceed to business at once. I lead a lonely life, that is, a very gay one. I go out a great deal; I cannot trust my servants; I want some one to have an eye to the house. I am often sick, and I want some one to nurse me. I will say to you what I would say to no one else, that I am old. I must be amused, to keep away the ugly thoughts I have sometimes. I have just recovered from a long and severe illness; my physician assures me I can live but a few years longer, and I intend to enjoy myself. I have waited but for your coming to open my house to my friends, to whom I do not intend to introduce you as my great niece, but as my cousin. If you can be content to live with me, to nurse me, to help dress me, to amuse me, and to overlook my house, I will reward you by taking you sometimes to the theatre, and to parties; I will dress you handsomely, you shall ride in my carriage, and I will leave you all my fortune."

"But what if I refuse to comply with these conditions? Let me see the other side of the picture."

"Willingly. You have one hundred dollars a year, and upon this immense sum you may support yourself splendidly, without a home, without a friend. Will you accept my conditions? Choose either wealth or want, riches or beggary."

"I will live with you as long as I can, with this one condition, that I leave you when I wish it."

"Certainly," was the cold reply. "Martin will show you your room."

And it is a room, and nothing more. It is very nicely furnished; but still the damp, cold atmosphere of the parlors has reached even here. It has not a home look. My trunks are unpacked, my books arranged on the tables and bureaus, for such a thing as a shelf or bookcase appears never to have entered my aunt's head; I have hung my mother's miniature opposite my bed; I have displayed all my schoolmates' gifts and tokens on the mantelpiece, and still the brilliant gas light shows me nothing but strange walls. What a grand, gloomy dinner we had! I could scarcely eat a morsel, and at supper it was just as bad. To-morrow I am to begin my humdrum life. There is nothing about the house to love, that I can see. Perhaps among the company that will throng my aunt's parlors next week, I may find a kindred spirit. How I long for the night of the grand party! Among five hundred people I may surely find a friend.

July 28th. I have not made a single entry since the day of my arrival. I have been so very busy. Dresses to be purchased and made, jewelry to be selected, invitations to be written, silver and china to be looked over, and refreshments to be ordered; all this "noise and confusion," for a few hours' amusement—call it not pleasure. Still, I have many fond dreams of what the party will be. It is a grand era in my life. It will determine whether the world is all as heartless and cold as my aunt; whether any one will care for the poor orphan; whether I shall pen down bright hopes and happy thoughts, or retire within myself to crush my affections, to steel my heart in indifference to everything that breathes, and to acknowledge that love and friendship are but a name, a shadow. They may talk and tease as they will; I maintain that woman cannot be happy without the society of the sterner sex! Oh! if I had but a brother or a lover! Let me see, what must be the requisites for my beau ideal? He must be tall and dark, he must have the most noble forehead, and such a pair of eyes! He must be religious, or I should not esteem him; high-spirited and generous, or I should not admire him; he must be stern, yes, stern to all others, and gentle and yielding only to me. Then if he were but a lawyer, I might stand a chance some day of being reckoned among the lady presidents." Riches I should not care about; indeed, I would rather he should be poor at first, so that I might show him how fond and true was my love. Heaven grant that my beau ideal may not prove merely an ideal beau!

September 1st. The grand affair is over at last, and I have seen my kindred spirit. He is a young midshipman, with such soul-beaming eyes. The first thing I saw upon entering the room were those eyes fixed upon my face. I clung to my aunt's arm in absolute terror, as we threaded our way through the crowd, my aunt bowing, and smiling, and whispering "Cousin Katy," in answer to the inquiries of "Who is she?" that buzzed on all sides.

"Allow me to relieve you of your fair charge, Miss Elliot," said a manly voice at my elbow. It was the midshipman.

"Thank you, Mr. Smith," was my aunt's courteous reply; "I could not leave Katy in better hands, as she is a novice in these matters. Pray take her into the conservatory, where her blunders and her blushes will have but few spectators."

Thus tutored, the graceful Mr. Smith tendered his arm, saying, as he did so, "I am too thankful for your cousin's evident jealousy to quarrel with it, as it has afforded me the pleasure of the society of one whose face reminds me strongly of a dear sister, who has long since left me."

I know not what I said in reply; something very foolish, I am sure; but once in the moonlit conservatory, with Walter Smith by my side, I forgot that he was a stranger—I forgot that I was an orphan. I forgot everything in the pleasure of that earnest conversation, where our hearts talked as well as our lips. The hours flew very rapidly as we discussed flowers, and birds, and school-life; and I was so sorry when the company thronged into the conservatory, on their way to the supper-room. How I wish people could live without eating, for one evening at least! After such spirit-communings, it was a terrible leap to fried oysters and chicken salad. And yet I love good things; but at that moment I would have given all the bombons that ever adorned a confectioner's window for one more long talk with Walter. He did not say one word that might not have been trumpeted from the housetop; but there was so much respectful deference in his manner, so much gentleness in his tone, that my heart is gone already. I know not whether my love is returned; there is nothing in my face to attract him, I am sure, for it is pale and passionless; my eyes a kind of alate color, and my hair the most rebelliously straight that ever grew on mortal's head. How I love the sea already, from hearing Walter's eloquent description! A lawyer! nonsense! A lawyer is but half a man. A pale, sneaking race; I'll have none of them. A sailor, a sailor for me. Bless me! the sun is rising already, and I have not yet doffed my gay dress. It is certainly very pretty, and Walter thinks ladies should always dress in white. Oh! I am so happy, so very happy!

September 2d. I have certainly passed a most wretched day. The first thing to ruffle me was pouring out coffee for my aunt. That good lady was in none of the best of humors. She blamed everything that I did. I could see plainly she was jealous of the attention I had excited the night before. After the meal was over, I ventured to ask for the key of the conservatory, which I knew, from experience, was always kept locked.

"No, indeed, miss; you sha'n't see the key nor the conservatory either, for a month at least. What do you want to see there? I should think you had enough of it last night."

I mumbled some excuse about wanting to see it by daylight. Deceitful Katy! when your only object was to live last night over again, and dream away the morning in that flower-scented air.

"I was ashamed of you last night," my aunt went on, "flirting so with Walter Smith, who has been engaged a full year to a pretty little girl in Connecticut. You needn't think to catch him, miss, for he is too honorable to break his troth, even if he were pleased by your pale face. Now, I want you to count over this silver; there should be forty dozen forks, and twice as many spoons. You will find the names of their owners on this slip of paper; and, mind, don't send away any with the mark 'Elliot' on them. I shall be down in the parlor to receive the visitors."

I felt like one stunned. Walter engaged to another! When he spoke of his home and future prospects, I thought he meant me by his "bright spirit;" but now I remember he did say something about his Lucy, and wished that I could see her. And to have to count spoons and forks, too, instead of revelling in a day-dream! I must manœuvre to see Walter once more. I must away to my counting now, and close my portfolio until evening.

Evening. I am not in love—not one bit. I was only dreaming. Walter called, as I had anticipated. I could not resist peeping over the stairs as he was leaving, and I heard him say, "You will give my compliments to Miss Katy Elliot. I regret exceedingly that this is my last visit to Philadelphia before my departure to the Mediterranean; but you will not refuse my parting request. Will you give this note to Katy? It is no billet-doux, believe me, but a few words of advice to one in whose welfare I feel a brother's interest."

Before the door had closed after him, I had rushed down stairs; and, wresting the note from the hand of my astonished aunt, I hastened to my own room. A brother's interest, truly! It was a kind note. He spoke touchingly of his departed sister, and of my resemblance to her; warned me of the shoals and quicksands among which the giddy whirl of Fashion would soon strand me; and urged me to have higher, nobler aims than the pleasure of an hour or the world's applause. "Your friend, Walter!" Those calm words have demolished all my castles. I am awake again. And awake, I trust, to a deeper sense of life's realities. I will try to keep myself "unspotted from the world;" a difficult task it will be, though, with a worldly aunt and my own sinful heart to resist. I will read Walter's note every morning, and I am confident that I will rise from its perusal strengthened and refreshed for the combat.

September 3d. I have been a very good girl to-day, and, as a reward, my aunt took me to the theatre this evening. Before we started, she called me into her dressing-room, with the twofold object of having her dress arranged and giving me some advice. She began by reminding me of my promise to call her cousin. It seems that "aunt" having escaped my lips several times on the evening of her party, had occasioned some unpleasant questions, which had ruffled her temper not a little. I promised to be more careful in future.

"And now, cousin Katy," she continued, in such a sweet voice, and with such an unwonted smile, that I fairly trembled, "I have good news for you, for I fear that ere long you will be off my hands. A gentleman, a rich young merchant, was exceedingly pleased with you on the evening of my party. You would have been introduced to him, had you not hidden yourself so provokingly; but I promised him that you should be at the theatre this evening. So now look your prettiest and smile your sweetest, for Lewis Carlton is no trifling prize, let me tell you. Many a beauty and many a belle have sued for his favors, but sued in vain."

Arrived at the theatre, the glare of lights, the buzz of voices, and the gay dresses so confused me that I forgot my aunt's counsel about "staring like a country girl," and sat with eyes and ears wide open until aroused by a tap on the shoulder. I turned, and saw my aunt and a gentleman standing beside me, both of whom burst into a hearty fit of laughter at my bewildered gaze. My aunt's kind manner reassured me, and Mr. Carlton's funny speeches soon restored my composure, if composure that could be called when I blushed brighter every moment, and my heart fluttered and my voice trembled, while I saw his scarcely disguised admiration, and heard his whispered praises. Could it have been love, that new strange feeling which makes me blush and tremble while I write? Mr. Carlton is certainly an original, although he does not equal my beau idéal so fully as Walter did. He is not at all handsome; perhaps he would be were it not for the pride which elevates his brow and curls his lip. You can see, by his every look, his every motion, that he is one of those who think themselves "too good for earth." And yet it is not a base pride—not the pride of wealth or of birth. It is the pride of intellect—a fearful pride! How I should cower beneath the lash, were it turned on me as it was on some we saw this evening! Such outting scorn, such bitter sarcasm! I was afraid to open my lips before him; but there was no need for fear. He evidently thinks that he and I are the only two persons in the world worth living in it; and my aunt assures me that another interview like the first will bring him to my feet.

I will sound his religious principles, and, if they are "all right," I will accept him. How delightful it will be to be free from my aunt's thralldom, with a husband to study my every wish, and to have wealth in abundance flowing into my coffers! What thousands I will bestow on the poor! As Mr. Carlton does not care about dress, I will have the more for charity; and it will not be my fault if I am not hailed as an angel of mercy by the bedside of the afflicted and in the hovel of the destitute.

September 8th. What a week this has been! Riding out with Mr. Carlton in his splendid barouche, walking with him, and receiving such splendid bouquets every morning! And it is all over now. I have rejected him, and have incurred thereby my aunt's anger and the world's disapproval. As my aunt had anticipated, he offered himself the next morning. I hardly knew how to act; but, amid blushes and stammerings, contrived to tell him that I esteemed him very much, but, until I knew more of his character, I could neither accept nor reject him. I was satisfied with the character he bore to the world; but I wanted to know more, to know his own self, before I pledged my faith. He was content to wait a week, and only a week. So we have been together nearly all the time, my aunt and every one else believing us to be engaged, while I took small pains to undeceive them, I was so confident of the result of the week's trial. All went on swimmingly until this morning. I was sitting in the conservatory, to which I now have free access, when I heard Mr. Carlton's step on the stairs. "Now," thought I, "I will put an end to this uncertainty. I will question him about his religion, for without that I would not wed a prince." It seems that I thought aloud, for Lewis came rushing in, asking "what prince had been wooing me, that I must needs talk of him to the flowers."

I told him what had caused my exclamation, and then we had a long, earnest conversation, at the close of which I rose up very proudly, and said, almost sternly, "No, Mr. Carlton; much as I admire your intellectual gifts, I will never wed you. No infidel may claim a place in my heart, although he shall ever have one in my prayers." With this cold answer, I was about leaving him; but, on looking back for a moment, I saw him leaning against the window, his face buried in his hands. I could not resist the impulse, so, quietly approaching him, I laid my own little Bible on his knee, and whispered, "Keep this, my parting token; read it, pray over it, and be blessed to believe it!" As I sat at my window, a moment afterwards, I heard the door close, and saw him jump into his carriage with my precious little Bible under his arm. I know not whether I have done right to part with it, my mother's Bible, and marked, as it is throughout, with her pencil; but I felt that if any volume could convince the sceptic, it would surely be that one, watered by a mother's tears, and consecrated by a mother's prayers.

September 9th. I have had much to bear to-day. For the first time, I was allowed to receive morning visitors. As one lady rose to depart, she congratulated me on my approaching marriage with Mr. Carlton. I calmly informed her that her congratulations were needless, for that gentleman and myself would henceforward meet as strangers. Casting a timid glance at my aunt, I saw, by the flashing of her eyes and the frown on her brow, that she repressed her rage with difficulty at this unlooked-for announcement; and scarcely had the door closed after her visitor, when the storm broke forth. She poured out a torrent of reproaches upon my devoted head, and furiously demanded the reason why I had rejected the most eligible man in the world, after receiving his attentions with so much apparent satisfaction. I gave it in a few words; and, while she was yet too astonished to reply, I questioned her in my turn. I told her how inconsistent her present conduct was with that on the day of my arrival here, and desired to know why she was so anxious to be rid of me, when her alleged purpose, in giving me a home, was to secure for herself a housekeeper and nurse. Could it be that she was jealous of the little admiration I excited—of the two or three wooers I had had?

She deigned not to reply, but ordered me to my room, to be kept a close prisoner there until her indignation has died away, or some new scheme requires my presence and assistance.

September 23d. After two weeks' sober reflection, greatly aided, doubtless, by the meagre fare which my aunt has assigned me, I have come to the conclusion that I have never been in love. My blushes and flutterings, when in Mr. Carlton's presence, I now attribute to their true cause, gratified vanity. I was young and inexperienced, unaccustomed to aught but censure and reproach, and Mr. Carlton's praises had awakened in my bosom a sentiment of which I was ignorant until then, and which I construed into a warmer feeling.

When will this tiresome captivity cease? Even my aunt's bitter taunts would be a relief from this monotonous solitude. And yet I have my books, my pencil, all with which I amused myself so successfully in days of yore. Why are they not sufficient now? There is a craving, a restless yearning arisen in my breast. I know not its object; but I do know that things once pleasant are now distasteful to me. I look on moonlight with a cold shudder; and the blue sky, the bright flowers, and the merry birds, all, all bring these words home to my heart: "We are so very happy, and you—what is life to you but a scene of suffering and sorrow, unloved and unloving? You were far better beneath the sod."

September 24th. A message from my aunt. Some one of her grandee acquaintance has sent to solicit her charity for a poor woman dangerously ill of a fever in a small alley back of her house. Mrs. Beaumont is about leaving the city, and, in her note, she commits this poor creature to the "charitable care" of my aunt. That worthy, not being able to shirk the obligation, and, at the same time, not daring to risk her precious life to the infection, has commissioned me to be her almoner, and I must don bonnet and shawl, and set out immediately. Perhaps I shall be soon "beneath the sod."

Evening. I have just returned from that wretched abode, and, do what I will, the picture of suffering is ever before me. The sufferer is evidently on the brink of the grave. Her large, dark eyes, with such an unearthly look, they haunt me still; and the brilliant color on her cheek, in fearful contrast with her pale, damp forehead. The room, too—I seem still to see the wretched pallet and rickety chair in the gorgeous damask and rosewood of my home.

The sick woman was alone when I entered. She seemed startled at the sight of a stranger; but I hastened to assure her I was a friend. She smiled faintly at the gold which I placed in her hand, saying that, in a few days, she would be beyond the need of it.

"But have you no relative, no friend to care for you?" I hurriedly inquired.

"I have one little daughter, a poor, misshapen thing, who is now out begging for bread. She will take care that your bounty is well applied. But who, when I am gone, will care for her?"

"The Father of the fatherless," said a deep, manly voice at my side.

I started back; but the sufferer, her face lighted up by a bright smile, extended her hand to the newcomer, and said—

"Oh, my minister, I knew you would not forget me! I thank you for reminding me, when I was about to repine, of my only comfort."

The young clergyman, for such was the unexpected visitor, knelt by the side of the dying woman, while I retired into a corner of the apartment. I watched him attentively while he spoke words of comfort and hope to the weary soul. The blush which had at first suffused his fine features at finding himself in the presence of a strange young lady faded away as he proceeded with his solemn duty, and such an expression of peace and purity stole over his countenance, that I gazed on him with admiration mingled with awe. I had listened to such words before, but in an assemblage of the gay and fashionable, with smiling faces and waving plumes around me; but, in that small room, in the presence of that dying woman, they bore a different meaning. Never before had I seen human nature so helpless and suffering; never before did the rich promises of the Gospel fall with such weight on my ear. The sick woman looked so enraptured, so different from the fretful, feverish invalid I had seen on my entrance, that I almost envied the being who could work such a spell. Then I thought how delightful it must be to be his sister or his wife, aiding him in his labors of love, soothing his cares by my smiles, and accompanying him to the homes of the desolate. My thoughts roved far, far away from that miserable abode to a snug little cottage in a western land, in which I was the presiding spirit, the minister's bride.

A slight noise at the door attracted my attention, and a child entered, whom I at once recognized as the poor woman's daughter. She was very lame and much deformed, but her face was absolutely beautiful. She had her mother's dark eyes and fine features, and her sunny curls, falling to her waist, half concealed the defect in her figure.

I beckoned to her, and she came timidly over into the corner where I stood. In a few whispered words, I made known to her that I was a friend come to relieve their wants; and, while she related to me her tale of woe, I was so busily scrutinizing her beautiful face, that I noticed not the prayer was ended, and, when I looked around, the clergyman was gone. After giving the child my direction, in case she should need assistance before morning, and promising to send them a physician, and to see them again very soon, I quitted the forlorn dwelling. I must go there to-morrow, for I must see that clergyman again. All my former visions of gayety and grandeur have faded away, and, in their stead, is one which I hope will not be so evanescent, in which a young minister is the principal personage, and I am the star of his home.

September 30th. Nothing but disappointment is in store for me. The morning after my visit to the sick woman, I presented myself to my aunt, and requested her permission to take some little delicacy with me, which might gratify the invalid's failing appetite. To my surprise, I received a peremptory "no," and was requested never to go near the place again. The physician, whom I had dispatched on my return home, had reported the disease to be scarlet fever, and although I might choose to risk my own life, my prudent aunt was not so careless of hers, and, in her delicate health, I might easily communicate the infection to her. So, for several days past, she has maintained a constant watch over my movements. Yesterday morning, however, while she was engaged with some company in the parlor, I could not resist the temptation to steal out into the court, and inquire of the woman's next neighbor how matters had been going on in my absence. To my surprise, I learned that the woman had died three days before.

"And what became of the little girl?" I asked.

"Oh, the minister took her to his own home."

I longed to ask where that home was, but dared not; so, thanking the woman for her information, I hurried home. I shall probably never see either of them again; and, now that I know the whole, I have become resigned to be watched and spied over. So that I have been so good to-day, that my aunt has promised to take me to a lecture this evening, where a most fashionable circle will be assembled to do honor to the great M——.

October 1st. The hall was crowded when we arrived last evening; but, by dislodging two gentlemen of our acquaintance, we procured seats near the stage. If I were a man, I should not altogether like to subject myself to so much inconvenience. If ladies will go late, they should pay the penalty. However, these two gallants gave up, as a matter of course, though I did think my aunt's nonchalant bow, in return for the courtesy, was rather ungrateful; so I tried to put a little warmth in my thanks. Such a buzzing and chattering as there was around us; but, when the lecturer entered the room, every voice was hushed, and every eye was bent on him in eager anticipation. And we were not disappointed. His voice at first was low and harsh; but, warming as he proceeded, he poured forth such a torrent of eloquence, in such clear, ringing tones, that the audience hung breathlessly upon his words. What a mighty gift is eloquence! There was that vast audience, the silver-haired patriarch, the youth with his bright, frank face, the blushing maiden of sixteen, and the strong man in his prime, all bowing their hearts to that one man's magic sway, and smiling or weeping at his bidding. Nay, more; they seemed to catch his inspiration, for every face reflected the earnestness, the intense rapture, or sorrow which glowed in the magician's countenance. And that magician, too, how changed from the pale, almost ugly man who so awkwardly entered the room! His brow lit up, and his eyes shot forth such lightning glances that he seemed, as he stood there, invested with almost superhuman beauty.

My eyes were riveted upon his face, and, long after the lecture was ended, I sat like one entranced, with those last words still echoing in my heart. In my heart, did I say? I have no heart; I have laid it at M——'s feet.

I was roused from my reverie by an antiquated beau complimenting me upon the brilliancy of my eyes and my rich color. What a fall it was to earth, after soaring on the wing of genius far, far above the clouds!

I looked around for my aunt. She had left my side, and was now in the midst of a circle of ladies who, surrounding the lecturer, were congratulating him, and proffering their hospitalities. When my aunt returned, the glow of gratified pride on her features made her look absolutely handsome, and I forgot her harshness and tyranny, while she told me she had secured M——'s company to dinner the next day.

"And now, Cousin Katy," said she, as we drove rapidly homeward, "let us make out a list of invitations. I want only the élite, the very cream of the aristocracy. M—— is an old bachelor, I hear; so I have set my heart on captivating him. So you must dress and behave, as you really are, a child; for I warn you, you will find me a merciless rival."

It was too dark for her to see the blush which, at those cool words, rudely dashing my airy fabrics to the ground, sprang to my brow; but those words revealed to me the state of my own heart. Had I not been dreaming again? Yes; in imagination, I had seen myself M——'s chosen one; I had heard that voice, which, a few moments before, had swayed the hearts of hundreds, pleading, in low, earnest tones, for a single smile from me. To me were all those burning thoughts and brilliant fancies confided, ere my poet husband penned them down; and to me alone he turned for that applause which thousands gave unbidden.

But I must away. The clock is on the stroke of three, and my aunt's bell has just rung for Cousin Katy to assist in her toilet. The child is arrayed in simple white, with no ornaments save a white rosebud in her bosom, while her aunt is radiant in velvet and jewels. We shall see which of the "rival queens" will win the poet's heart.

October 2d. The party is over; and, if I have been désabusé, which one of my merry schoolmates translated as "dreadfully abused," I have at least had a hearty laugh for the first time this many a long day.

The guests arrived early, and one of the first was M——. As his name was announced, my aunt's face brightened, and she smiled her sweetest. I, too, peeped out from my corner, trying too look very interesting. But M—— came not alone. A beautiful lady hung on his arm, whom he begged leave to present to my astonished aunt as Mrs. M——!

I gave one glance at my aunt, secretly pitying her; but her crestfallen look so amused me that I could not restrain my mirth. Such a disappointment! she could hardly conceal it, and Mrs. M—— was greeted less cordially than her single husband would have been.

That evening I was the gayest of the gay. I was not disappointed, the whole affair was so ludicrous. Yet what could have been the feeling I had towards M——?

October 5th. A few days' reflection have convinced me it was admiration—intense admiration. I had never seen one so worthy of it before; indeed, I had never before admired any one. This new feeling, verging almost on that adoration to which love alone has just claim, I mistook for love. But oh, it was so funny!

October 8th. I have had quite an exciting time to-day. As my aunt and I were taking our usual prosy ride in the country, the horses took it into their heads to run away. The coachman was thrown from his seat, and the furious creatures rushed madly on. My aunt screamed; but I sat silent, expecting every moment to be dashed to pieces. The road we were going was a very lonely one, scarcely a house to be seen, and I thought we were beyond the reach of human aid. The horses flew along until they came to an abrupt turn in the road, which upset the carriage. I was thrown out on one side, and my aunt on the other. Fortunately, I fell into a mud-puddle, which probably saved my life; but my aunt was dashed out on a stone heap, and lay insensible. For two hours I sat by her side, vainly endeavoring to restore her to consciousness. What was to be done? The sun was setting; there was not a house in sight; in a short time, I would be alone, and in darkness. At this moment, I heard the trotting of a horse. I feared it was one of our own maddened beasts returning; but, in a short time, I saw a gentleman approaching. At the sight of the broken carriage, and the two lonely women, he reined in his horse and sprang from the saddle. A few words sufficed for an explanation, and he immediately remounted and returned for assistance.

The sun had now set, and the shades of evening were closing round me. There was nothing to be heard but the monotonous chirping of the crickets, always a mournful sound to me, but rendered doubly so by my present forlorn situation. I stole around once more to the stone heap, and looked long and earnestly at my insensible aunt. It was the first time I had ever scrutinized her features, and I now saw the traces of what in youth must have been surpassing beauty. Those finely-formed features were now sharpened by age, the proud, dark eye was sunken, and the mouth wore an expression of such suffering, that I would fain have turned away. A new thought darted across my mind. My aunt must have had some great trial, some acute suffering, to have made her so utterly heartless and selfish. And I, instead of endeavoring to cheer and comfort her, had embittered and pained her by my taunts and my disobedience. Inwardly, I vowed never again to thwart her, should her life be spared; for, had she not given me a home when I was homeless? had she not endeavored to procure me a husband when I was friendless?

My cogitations were interrupted by the return of the gentleman. He had procured a small carriage, in which we gently laid the unconscious woman, and then drove with all speed towards home. When we arrived there, after my aunt had been carried to her room, and a physician sent for, the gentleman was stealing away; but I delayed him a moment.

"May we not know to whom we are so much indebted?" I asked, in a pleasing tone.

The gentleman shook his head, but promised to call on the morrow. As he was descending the steps, he met the physician, and exchanged a bow of recognition with him.

"Oh, Dr. B——, who is he?" I exclaimed, seizing his arm.

"The Earl of D——," was the calm reply, as he proceeded to his patient's room.

Was this indeed the Earl of D——, of whom I had seen so many on dit in the newspapers? They had been ringing with his name for some weeks past. He was young, noble, and immensely wealthy, and, wearied with the artificial beauties of London, had come to America, avowedly, to seek a wife among the Yankee girls. A new subject for a "chateau en Espagne." Perhaps the romantic situation in which he found me made some impression on his heart; for these men love to be protectors. They have a kind of pride in their superior strength, and they are thankful to the women for giving them opportunity to exercise it. They see a young lady in danger, their pity impels them to rush to her rescue, and we all know what pity is akin to. Then the grateful young lady, rescued from a fall from her horse, falls right away in love, and there is no rescue, no help for her then.

To be sure, my appearance was not very fascinating; for my face and hands were daubed with mud, my bonnet crushed by my fall, and my dress soiled and dragged by the dew. I heaved a deep sigh as I turned from the mirror, for I feared that my frightful appearance would counterbalance the sweets of protection in the earl's mind. Oh, if I should captivate him! How I should love to be with him in the halls of his ancestors, myself the "lady châteline," doing the honors of his splendid castle to a crowd of titled guests! Then I imagined myself in the midst of his peasantry, gliding like an angel of mercy into their dwellings, sharing alike their joys and sorrows, and loved and praised by all. Then the scene changed. I was in the stately drawing-room of Victoria. The noble and the beautiful were around me; yet all eyes were fixed on the little American lassie, the wife of one of England's proudest peers. Jewels were in my hair, gems flashed upon my bosom, and I was the centre of an admiring circle, while I told, in a low, clear voice, of my own free home.

That tiresome bell again! Have I so soon forgotten my vow? Here have I been dreaming away, when my aunt may be struggling for life or death.

October 9th. The earl called, as he had promised, but merely to inquire after my aunt. He did not ask for me; but I learn from Dr. B—— that he is on the eve of departure for England. The chateau has fallen once more. The doctor is fearful that my aunt has sustained some internal injury.

October 15th. I was admitted into my aunt's room to-day, for the first time since her illness. Disease has made fearful ravages on her countenance. She is so very thin, and has such a haggard look, that I was forced to turn away to hide my tears. The doctor is anxious for my aunt to go into the country. Now that she is a little better, her gay friends have begun calling again, and he dreads the excitement. So we are to prepare immediately for a visit to an old widow lady, a friend of my aunt's, who resides about ten miles from the city. Her grandson and granddaughter are the only members of her household, so that we shall be very retired. To me, this is the very pleasantest time to visit the country, although my aunt says it gives her the horrors. I shall have plenty of time for dreaming now; but no foundation, I fear, for my castles.

October 22d. We arrived at Woodside this morning. It is a very old house, built before the Revolution. In spite of its antiquity, I think it deplorably ugly; for, besides being built of brick, always an eyesore in the country, it has seven ugly poplars before the door. The people I like very much: the grandmother, although older than my aunt, is still healthy, and even blooming, attributable, I presume, to early hours, simple fare, and an active life. The granddaughter is on a visit to New York; but the grandson is at home, and was standing at the door to greet us.

Harry Churchill, for such is his name, is a model of manly beauty. He is very tall, but so finely proportioned that you would not notice his height, unless you compared him with a medium-sized man. His out-of-door exercises have bronzed his cheek and hardened his hands; but his welcome was as courteous as though he had lived all his life in the polished society of the city, instead of among pigs and chickens. He is so lively and witty, too. I was somewhat embarrassed at being obliged to introduce myself, for my aunt had fallen into a doze during the latter part of our ride; but old Mrs. Churchill's kind manner made me completely at home, and, in a few minutes, Harry and I were chatting like old friends. After we had discussed some fine gingerbread and currant wine, for the making of which the old lady is famous, my aunt expressed a wish to retire to her room before tea, and we were ushered there accordingly.

When the door had closed after our departing hostess, my aunt cast a disdainful glance around the room, and, heaving a deep sigh, threw herself upon the bed. I, too, took a survey of the room; but I saw no cause for sighing, as the furniture, though old fashioned, was as bright as hands could make it, and, though the gorgeous curtains which clothed our windows at home were wanting here, the white rose and woodbine made a far prettier canopy.

When the tea bell rang, my aunt refused to rise, and bade me go down alone. A most bountiful table was spread, and, after dispatching some of the good things, Mrs. Churchill insisted upon my taking a walk with Harry, as she and my aunt wanted to talk about old times. I joyfully consented, and, donning my little white sunbonnet, I took Harry's offered arm. How far we walked I know not. I only know that we sat for an hour upon an old bridge in the moonlight, singing the wildest snatches of songs imaginable; and then Harry must needs volunteer an expedition into the woods for some bright-colored autumn leaves for a wreath, and of course I would not be left alone. Then I had to wait until the young gentleman had woven the wreath, and then—just as he was placing it upon my head—the mellow notes of—not a French, but a dinner horn, came floating on the air. I sprang from the old log which had served us for a sofa, and we returned home a little faster than we came. On our return we found my aunt and Mrs. Churchill awaiting us at the door, the latter brandishing the great horn which had startled us so.

"Now, not a word, ladies," said Harry, anticipating their reproofs, "not a word about the dew or the hour; I dare say, when you were girls together, you often stayed out at the old bridge later than this, with your lovers."

This speech displeased me for a moment; in the first place, I thought it was rather disrespectful to my aunt, an entire stranger to him, and then—and then—I somehow felt that there was a sly insinuation that he was my lover. However, I soon forgot it, so surprised was I at my aunt's manner. At Harry's speech she started, gave a quick look at Mrs. Churchill, and a blush suffused her usually pallid features. What could it mean? I'll ask Mrs. Churchill to-morrow. She and my aunt were friends in youth, and they often spent months together at this house in their girlhood.

After all, a farmer is, I am inclined to think, the noblest of men: they have hearts, an article in which I think our ball-room beaux are sadly deficient. Living so much in the open air, their bodies are healthy, their brains clear. And I—though not cut out exactly for a farmer's wife—I was surely "born to love pigs and chickens."

I have just been taking a last look at the moon before retiring, and I saw in imagination a youthful pair walking upon the lawn. There, they are seated upon the fence. The maiden appears to be studying the conformation of the grasses, so earnestly she gazes on the velvet turf at her feet: and the youth is a student too; but the science of blushology engages his attention. That is a dangerous fence, it appears, for the youth's arm now encircles the maiden's waist—it must be to keep her from falling. There must be some wise plan on foot, for they are "putting their heads together." Hark! What was that? A—

It is rather singular, but the maiden looks very much like Miss Katy Elliot, and the youth's face and figure are Harry Churchill's own!

October 23d. I had a nice talk with Mrs. Churchill to-day. I inveigled her into a good humor, by asking permission to manufacture a huge gingerbread under her superintendence, and then, when her hands were in the dough and there was no escape, I began the conversation rather abruptly:—

"Mrs. Churchill, my aunt must have been very beautiful when young; why did she never marry? Had she ever a lover?"

"She never had but one, my dear, and that was thirty years ago."

"Oh! do tell me all about it. I am sure it is a romantic story."

"Your aunt and I were cousins and bosom friends. Your aunt had an only brother—your grandfather, my dear—and a prouder youth I never saw before, nor since. Some trifle—the color of a curtain, I believe—occasioned such a difference between his father and himself, that your grandfather left the mansion of his ancestors, vowing never to return there again. Your great-grandfather was equally exasperated, and disinherited him upon the spot. After her brother's departure, your aunt was so very lonely that I invited her to spend a few weeks with me. I was a bride, then, Katy, and so very happy myself that I could not bear to see a cloud on my cousin's brow; so my husband and myself tried every means in our power to obliterate from your aunt's mind the sad memories that rankled there. For a time we were unsuccessful; but one day I noticed that my cousin delayed longer than usual her return from her walk. Upon going to the door to seek her, I saw her sitting upon the old bridge, where you too sat last evening; but she was not alone. A young man, whom I soon recognized as the village schoolmaster, was at her side, and, after an animated conversation, I saw him press her hand to his lips, and, bounding over the fence, was soon out of sight. When she returned home, I chid her gently for her delay, but, seeing her blush deeply, I was considerate enough to postpone my inquiries until I could question her alone.

"That evening I stole into her room. She was sitting in the moonlight pressing a miniature to her lips. She gave a start at my entrance and tried to look unconcerned, but I soon obtained her confidence and her secret. The schoolmaster had wooed and won her, but she dreaded her father's displeasure. He was so very aristocratic, so very proud, that he would laugh her to scorn dared she reveal her love. 'But try him, only try him, Alice,' I urged; 'he will not refuse the prayer of his only daughter.'

"'Oh! he will: you don't know my father. His proud eye will flash, and his thin lip curl. I dare not—I cannot. I would rather brave a lion than my angry father.'

"Then let me try, Alice. I will plead for you. Dry your tears, dearest, and this evening, when you see a white handkerchief waving from the carriage window, know that my mission has been successful."

"I was soon on my road to town. As I entered the gloomy mansion, the abode of the Elliots, father and son, for nearly a century, a feeling of awe stole over me. Passing through several deserted apartments, I entered the library. There sat the old man, busied in his usual morning occupation of reading a journal kept by his son from his tenth to his twentieth year. He had perused it over and over again, ur, a

and still took a mournful pleasure in conning over all that now remained to him of his darling son. At my entrance he laid the volume aside, and, courteously greeting me, bade me be seated. I briefly stated the object of my visit. The old man drew himself proudly up, and said, in a voice in which pride and sorrow struggled for the mastery, 'Bid Alice remember her brother's fate. No pauper shall wed an Elliot.' In vain I told him of the noble character of his daughter's lover; how strong and deep was his affection; and how intensely it was returned. All was vain.

"I will allow Alice three days for reflection. If, at the expiration of that time, she chooses to return, I will receive her with open arms; but if she prefers poverty and a father's curse to wealth and his blessing, my doors shall be forever closed upon her."

"Slowly and sadly I took my road homewards, for I knew Alice's proud disposition, and how she valued wealth and its distinctions. I dared not unfurl the white handkerchief, although I saw Alice at the window, eagerly watching my approach. I saw her turn away with a look of disappointment, and in another moment she stood at the hall door, bathed in tears. As gently as possible, I unfolded to her her father's irrevocable decision, and I saw she trembled violently. She retired to her own room, begging not to be disturbed until the next day.

"The next morning, as I threw up my window at early sunrise, I saw, sitting on the old bridge, my cousin and her lover. Her face was hid upon his shoulder, and he appeared to be vehemently urging his suit. What arguments he used I know not; but Alice returned, her face radiant with happiness, and smilingly begged me to send a messenger to town for her books and jewels, as now she was to be one of us. A servant was dispatched immediately.

"That morning the young schoolmaster insisted upon our going to view the arrangements he had made for his expected bride. He had engaged two small rooms at a tavern in the village, and furnished them to the utmost extent of his means.

"Alice shuddered as we passed up the narrow stair; and, when we entered the cramped apartment which was to serve them for parlor, she cast an exploring glance at me which spoke volumes. It told of pride, of disappointment, of wavering.

"'It is not very grand, dear Ally,' I replied cheerfully; 'but William has done wonders. Here are your favorite flowers, the heliotrope and geranium, in the window; and these white muslin curtains look so cheerful! There is a cute little corner for your harp, and your workstand will look nicely here. What a charming rocking-chair! How thoughtful and kind of him to do everything so silently and so nicely!'

"'But a tavern, coz—how could I ever receive my fashionable friends in a tavern? To be sure,' added she, with a sigh, 'they will none of them remember me now.'

"'And would you grieve for such friends?'

"'Not grieve for them, but miss them,' was her quick reply.

"About dinner-time, the servant returned with her books and jewels. Alice sighed as she drew the glittering gems from their velvet bed, saying, as she did so, 'there's nobody to see them, now.'

"Thanking her for her compliments, I left the room to attend to some household affairs. In an hour I returned, but started back with surprise as I crossed the threshold. I had never before seen Alice so surpassingly beautiful. She had arrayed herself in a black velvet robe, which displayed the faultless contour of her neck and arm. Her dark hair was confined by a diamond circlet, and the same bright jewels sparkled on her bosom. There was a deep flush on her cheek, and a wild light in her eye, as she turned from the mirror.

"'Look at me, coz: think you not I will grace the Cross Keys Tavern? No, cousin, no; my decision is taken: I return home this evening. Much as I love William, I cannot live without wealth. I have ever been nurtured in luxury; and imagine, coz, these white arms scrubbing that wretched little room, or washing my husband's linen. I will go, and you will spare William the agony of a parting by telling him I have returned to my father.'

"A deep breath was drawn at my side, as if some one's life was departing in agony. It was Alice's lover! Such a scene as ensued! At first entreaties and prayers; then reproaches and bitter words. Yes, there were words spoken that blanched my lip and paled my cheek, while those two proud spirits stood calm and cold beside me! In that very room in which your aunt is now sleeping, the lovers parted, never to meet again. Alice has been dragging out her weary life in gayety and splendor, while William died in a southern land, of a broken heart."

Here the fumes of the scorching cake reached us, and Mrs. Churchill abruptly bade me go to my aunt's room, to see if she wanted anything.

October 25th. We attended the little church in the valley to-day. Harry drove us in the little carriage, and I was rather surprised to hear Mrs. Churchill whisper to my aunt, "See what a spell your Katy has wrought already! Harry never would accompany me to church: he says the preacher is prosy, and always puts him to sleep."

"Very well, Mr. Harry, you shall attend this time," thought I to myself. So when the sermon began, I resisted all his attempts to make me laugh, turned a deaf ear to his chatterings, and pretended not to notice his funny faces. I did not think he liked it altogether; but if there is anything despicable in my eyes, it is to see a man behaving silly in church. If they do not respect its solemnity themselves, they may stay away, for no noble-hearted, dignified girl will deign to bestow a smile on one who behaves like such a baby.

Harry was all smiles and good-humor this afternoon. Some country lads and lasses paid us a visit, and by mutual consent we adjourned to the swing. Here it became so evident that he would swing no one but me, that I had to submit to no little teasing; but Harry has so much tact in returning the compliment, that my blushes passed unnoticed. How delightful it is to have a witty companion! I laugh so much all day that my face is in a perpetual grin. If the offer were to come now, I should certainly not say no.

October 27th. How I wish people could be quiet, sometimes! I was reading such a pathetic story to-day, and Harry came with one of his everlasting puns. I had to laugh, though I was very angry, because I was just preparing to cry. That fellow is ridiculous, sometimes. He has very pretty teeth, however.

October 30th. I am beginning to tire of Harry's perpetual puns. As somebody says, "he seizes your honest words, and turns them into traitors before your eyes." Honest words, sad words, kind words, or hard words, it makes no difference to him. And then he is continually scraping up all kind of queer sayings and funny anecdotes, with which he favors me during our evening walks. He has not much depth, that same Harry; all is froth, and, to use a preserving simile, "scum." I wish our month's sojourn were ended.

November 3d. I have kept my room to-day, pleading sickness. And truly I am sick, but it is of Harry. I hate the sound of his voice, and the perpetual glitter of those ivories. I hear his "ha! ha! ha!" even now. My illness does not cause him much uneasiness. How I dread that offer! I know it is coming, and that speedily, for my aunt and Mrs. Churchill are continually talking about it.

November 4th. I was very rude to-day, but I could not help it. Harry came to the door this morning, and begged to be admitted; "it was so pitch dark down stairs without me," he said.

My aunt opened the door and disappeared. Harry came bounding in, and, throwing himself on the floor at my feet, began talking away in his usual style as fast as his tongue could run. After rattling away for some time, he suddenly stopped, blushed, and was silent for some moments. Then, seeing him twist his mouth all possible ways, as if he tried to say something serious, but didn't know how, and just as he pronounced the word "Ka-Katy," I sprang from the sofa and ran out of the room. I flew down the garden-walk, and over the fence, and never rested until I threw myself into the swing. Nor did I leave it until I saw Harry go out of the house and take the road to the village. I dread meeting Harry again. Luckily, the two old ladies know nothing of my flight, or I should not escape so easily.

November 5th. I breakfasted in my room this morning, but knowing I should not be safe from Harry there, I took an early opportunity to run off into the orchard. "He will not seek me here," thought I; but I was mistaken, for I soon saw him coming desperately in that direction. "If I can but get up a tree, I can hide." So I scrambled up, with great difficulty, into a huge apple-tree; but lo! Harry had seen me, and was making directly towards me. I thought I must get down; I never could be caught up the tree; so down I came; but my foot slipping, horrible to relate, I fell right into Harry's arms!

"Now I have you!" he exclaimed, and burst into a roguish laugh.

Then, without further hesitation, he poured forth such declarations of love and everlasting fidelity, that I was almost stunned.

As soon as I could speak, for, with the fright, the fall, and the declaration, I was wellnigh dumb-founded, I disengaged myself from his grasp, and uttering a calm "No, sir!" made the best of my way homewards.

When I reached my room, there was my aunt extended on the floor, with an open letter beside her. Involuntarily I glanced my eye over it, and what was my horror to find that she was now penniless! A fire had destroyed all of her property in the city, which was uninsured, and a scamp of an agent had run off with the money she had in bank.

A physician was summoned, as my aunt still lay insensible, and he pronounced it an attack of paralysis. The undue excitement caused by the letter, acting upon an already enfeebled frame, has prostrated her thus. She has somewhat recovered from her stupor, but her speech is entirely gone. I am almost distracted. A helpless invalid and poverty; and I must be hands and head both, in this unlooked-for catastrophe. A knock at the door. It is a note from Harry. He begs pardon for intruding at such a moment, but cannot help writing to assure me that the events of the morning have but increased his desire of cherishing and protecting me. He was rude and abrupt this morning, and perchance I deemed it presumption in him to aspire to the heiress's hand; but now he longs to offer me a home and a husband, when my only protector seems about to be taken away.

He is a noble fellow; this note has shown me how disinterested is his love; but still I cannot return it: I do not love him as I once dreamed. I never can wed one of his character, for there is little sympathy between us.

November 6th. My plans are formed; I leave for the city to-morrow. Mrs. Churchill has offered my aunt a home until I can remove her to town. The good old lady grieves very much; she whispered to me, "I had hoped, my dear, this house would be your home always; but Harry tells me it may not be."

Harry's spirits seem quite subdued. I had a long talk with him this morning, and he is now satisfied that my decision is irrevocable. He drives me to the city to-morrow.

November 7th. I have been busy to-day, very. It was early morning when we entered the town, and we drove immediately to the residence of Mr. Marshall, an old friend of my aunt's. By his advice, I dismissed all my aunt's servants, excepting old Biddy, a faithful Irish woman, whom I retain to nurse my aunt. I have also arranged the furniture and plate for the great sale which takes place day after to-morrow. I intend taking a couple of rooms, in a quiet street, and as I have quite a talent for music, I hope to maintain myself and aunt by giving lessons. Mrs. Marshall has promised me a number of pupils; and, as I have an income of one hundred dollars, I think we shall do very well.

November 10th. I have succeeded in procuring two very pleasant rooms in B— Street. I have fitted up the room fronting the street as a sort of parlor. My huge piano looks rather out of place in such a small apartment; but, as old Biddy quaintly observes, "it will take the less fire to warm it." The adjoining room is for my aunt. I did not forget the stuffed cat, which, I believe, was a pet kitten of her lover's, in days of yore. I have retained but little of her gorgeous furniture, but I could not resist appropriating one luxurious chair, which well deserves the name of "Sleepy Hollow." To-morrow I bring my aunt home, and the next day I begin with my pupils, of whom I already have nine. How I hope I may succeed!

November 17th. I have now been a week in this novel situation. I do not find it irksome as yet, but am often reminded of the proverb "a new broom sweeps clean." My aunt's disposition has greatly changed since this last attack. Not that she has become any kinder or more loving, but the "haughty Miss Elliot" is now merged in the peevish, childish invalid. She still finds fault with me, still murmurs at everything I do to assist her; but her mind is so evidently gone that her reproofs do not trouble me now. A spirit of contradiction seems to have taken possession of her; when the weather is mild, she insists upon a fire, and when to-day it is so cold that I have worn a shawl in the house, the windows must be all flung open. Her only pleasure appears to be in listening to the music, of which she is very fond; and the door between the rooms must always be open.

November 20th. I am wearied almost to death. My head aches so I could scarcely see the notes, and my aunt grows every day more fretful and discontented. She has taken to screaming lately, and really sometimes I am afraid she will alarm the neighbors. She cries all day long, wishes she were dead, and accuses me of poisoning her. She says old Biddy tries to strangle her every night with the nightcap. It were far better to die than to drag out existence thus.

My pupils, too, are not so obedient and amiable as they at first appeared. How soon children learn to ape their elders! My pupils evidently hear at home, that I am a degraded creature, fit only to minister to the pleasure of those who formerly flattered and caressed me so. Their mothers appear to have forgotten that "Miss Elliot," the pale music teacher, was once on a par with them in gentility, and far beyond them in wealth. I hear no more of "my dear creature," or "my charming Katy," now.

November 25th. I received an offer to-day, which surprised me not a little. Old Mr. Marshall, who visits us frequently, and has seen innumerable displays of my aunt's childishness and troublesome whims, is exceedingly desirous to remove her to an asylum, about three miles from the city. It is expressly for "reduced gentlewomen" in her situation; they are faithfully nursed and cared for, and it is as unlike a hospital or almshouse as possible. Mr. Marshall says I have too much on my shoulders; that I cannot stand it; but he has no patience with my aunt, and takes a prejudiced view of the case. But I have steadfastly refused the proposition. I am beginning to exercise, I trust, a little of that charity which "suffereth long and is kind," and I cannot desert my aunt in her hour of adversity. She is so utterly dependent upon me for the most trifling assistance, that I cannot turn her over to a stranger. It was a strong temptation, however, for my aunt's worrying ways have almost worn me out. Indolence whispered that my aunt knew not, nor cared whence food and warmth came, if they were but supplied, and at the asylum she would have attentive nurses, more skillful than rough old Biddy; that she would not miss me much, as she hated me so; that I would have so much more leisure if she were away—I could rest from my constant labors, and the headache would probably vanish. That last was a powerful argument, for this dull, heavy pain in my brow seems to crush out all vivacity, and even all thought. I stood firm, though, and Mr. Marshall left the house no little displeased that I, a weak youngster, should resist the pleadings and arguments of an "old graybeard," for so he styles himself.

December 1st. I had just thrown myself on the bed, at my aunt's side, this afternoon, and had closed my eyes for a few minutes' nap, when old Biddy opened the door, and informed me a gentleman wanted to see me in the parlor. A gentleman! Instantly visions of Lewis Carlton, returned, repentant, to claim my hand, thronged my mind as I hastily smoothed my hair and arranged my collar. But when I entered the parlor, the young clergyman rose to meet me. The little deformed girl was at his side. He begged pardon for the intrusion, and explained in a few words the occasion of his visit. He was going as a missionary to India, he said, and knowing no one to intrust little Ellen to during his absence, had taken the liberty of seeking me, to beg me to be a mother to her. He had heard of our altered circumstances, and if it would not be convenient for me to take her, he could perhaps find a place for her as a servant. "Only," he continued, in a low tone, "she is so refined and intelligent, I should dread to see her in that capacity, and I think you would be rewarded for your care in her dutiful affection, and happy, joyous spirit."

I paused a moment to consult Mr. Judgment, a very potent adviser of late. It would be trouble, certainly; and my means were not so very ample just now; but—the child's looks pleased me—I wanted to do a kind action, and oblige the young clergyman—so I consented.

Then—for he seemed kind and gentle—I opened my heart to him. I told him how wearied I was of earth; how I longed and yet dreaded to die; how the chalice of disappointment was ever at my lips, and how bitter was the draught. I told him of Walter's warning, and how it had been forgotten in the excitement and splendor around me. I told him of the yearnings after something higher and nobler, that filled my breast. That there was a void in my heart which earthly love could not fill—and would he tell me of heavenly love?

The young clergyman paused for a moment; then, taking my hand and looking full in my face with his dark earnest eyes, he told me of a heavenly love. He bade me look beyond this scene of sorrow to a brighter world, where the "wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest." He urged me to live in the shadow of the cross; to fix my eye upon a crucified Redeemer, and to press onwards and upwards. He bade me remember this world was but the trial-scene which would decide my weal or woe for an eternity. I have talents—let me improve them; influence—let me exert it. I was yet in the morning of life, and what an incalculable amount of good might I accomplish during my three-score years and ten!

Taking a small Bible from his pocket, he marked a verse with his pencil, and laid it in my lap. Then, invoking a blessing upon me and the little orphan, he wrung my hand warmly, and left the room. I opened the volume, and read through my tears: "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in Heaven."

June 31st, 184—. It is one year to-day since I made the first entry in my journal. But how changed from the vain, giddy girl, who then penned down her fond anticipations of earth! I blush in reading over the records of my thoughts, to see the air-castles I built; the dreams I had—and of naught beyond this world. I was dreaming, indeed.

But I am wide awake now, and awake, I trust, to a deeper sense of life's realities, of its mysteries. Now I try to live for others; and my happiness flows from within. I can be cheerful, nay, even gay, in my humble home, although no "dark-eyed youth" is at my side, and no poet-lover bends over me. Neither do I hasten to "shuffle off this mortal coil," for, though I long earnestly and ardently for the spirit-land, I am so very busy and so very happy, in my narrow sphere, that I have no time and no mind to repine. Once I longed to be "beneath the sod," and thought earth was so dark and dreary; but now all nature smiles on me. The skies and the flowers tell of peace and purity, and the birds sing of happiness; and my being seems to harmonize with the birds and the flowers.

I have not been without trials, for my aunt was very ill last winter, and my scanty means well nigh failed; but now the dark cloud is removed, and Ellen and I can sing our cheerful songs once more. Truly, it is "more blessed to give than to receive." Ellen was, indeed, a treasure to me last winter. She alone could soothe my aunt to repose. She lightened old Biddy's labors, and, when I would come home from my scholars, wearied and disheartened, she would throw her arms around me, and speak words of hope to my fainting soul. And often now when my temples throb and my heart beats wildly, I hear her ringing laugh and gentle tones, and I am encouraged and strengthened.

I have to treat my aunt just like a child. She is a perfect infant in her helplessness and confiding simplicity, and I tell her of God and her Saviour as I would a child of four years old. To my great joy, she appears to understand me; for, when I speak of "heavenly things," her face brightens, and she presses my hand. Her pride has all gone, and in its stead are peace and innocence.

May every maiden who dreams of love, when her slumbers are broken, have as blissful a waking as Katy Elliot's!

LINES IN MEMORY OF CLARA Z. WRIGHT, WHO DIED APRIL 29, 1852.

BY IRA L. JENKINS.

Six dwells in blissful mansions, far above
The dazzling and resplendent orb of day;
And walks, with angels, that Elysian grove
Where glory sheds a never-ending ray.

Her brow is wreathed with roses plucked from fields
Where showers of amarantine hue descend
Undying flowers there purest incense yield,
And love and harmony forever blend.

The angels lead her through celestial bowers
Into the shadow of their green retreat;
She drinks the nectar of unfading flowers,
And kneels in reverence at the mercy-seat.

To her I gave the first-fruits of my muse,
And saw, with joy, long-absent health return
Ungrateful heart were mine to now refuse
To plant her virtues deep in memory's urn.

Not mine to dress in sable weeds her bier,
Nor mine to break the seal of love divine;
But mine to pay the tribute of a tear,
And lead the muse to friendship's hallowed shrine

THE TOWN AND COUNTRY.

BY E. JANE CATE.

CHAPTER I.

THE following sketch was not penned to show to thee, gracious reader, that Vanity Fair is open only in the town, or that the Valley of Humiliation lies always where one may see green fields, meandering brooks, and quiet flocks. But this—that, however strong may be our predisposition for the indulgence of any passion—vanity, for instance—this passion's growth and activity depend, sometimes at least, less upon the struggles we may make, or neglect to make, than upon the social position we find ourselves occupying. It may be now that some pale metaphysician will lay his finger-point upon the old tome he is reading, and, lifting his large, cold eye, say, slowly and impressively: "That is not virtue, child, which comes along to us of its own accord. Freedom from vanity is not a virtue, when there are no conflicts for us, no lions in the way of its attainment." We will lay our hand on our heart at this, and bend our heads, and say, "Perhaps, sir;" but go on admiring humility, and love, and every Christian grace, whether its growth is spontaneous and free, and in those places where no weeds spring up to choke it, or among rocks and tares, which make its growth the result of watchfulness and toil.

"Ah, my very fine cousin! So you have conquered uncle; your boudoir is indeed elegant; and now tell me how much happier you are."

"Why, a vast deal, I do assure you. But now, Carl, pray don't grow sarcastic. All bluestockings do, I believe; and for this very reason will I always pray the graces to keep me from Minerva. Look, now, ma cousine; there, I will throw down my curtain. What a beautiful light one gets through rich purple curtains! I never could endure my white ones; but now don't you think that my boudoir is, in the ensemble, more splendid even than Miss Vane's? Only she has a Psyche, if I only had a Psyche! But we shall see. I have a Hebe, you see; beautiful, isn't it? but then only in China; and pa is rich enough for anything; and I his only child! I think it a pity—ha, Caroline, just look out! 'Tis Serena Mercer in her '33 chaly, and that old capote of hers, and the very aloes it bore last year."

"And all this is——"

"Why, yes, well enough; for I know this is what you would say; well enough for Serena. She does not care a fig what she wears; and, pardonnez moi, you are like her in this thing; and I believe this is the reason that everybody feels and says: 'Well,

48*

It is all right, after all, in Miss Mercer and Caroline Norris, they are so—so independent!"

"So—so proverbially odd—do they not say this sometimes, Susan?" asked Caroline, smiling.

"In truth, they do. And we fashionable butterflies always add—'But now I——' as we look complacently down upon our robe of gaze fleur des anges, or our pelisse of gros princesses, or our scarf of gaze sylphide. The gentlemen have the gallantry to temper their admiration by adding—'But—yet—after all, these severe beauties are rather—rather too independent and cold. We would ask more human frailty, more——'"

"Susan! 'more human frailty'?"

"Yes! yes, Caroline! Frank Vane actually said this one day, in one of his stupid rhapsodies; 'more human frailty!' he said; 'more softness, more deference to la mode;' and then he said 'Ha, ha, ha!' and 'He, he, he!'"

"And I suppose you 'fashionable butterflies' laughed too, and declared him infinitely witty, infinitely amusing?" said Caroline, looking quietly up from a screen she was examining.

"Yes, certainly; all in graciousness, however, you know."

"But you ought not to encourage his excessive and increasing foolishness; it is actually spoiling his naturally fine mind. What a beautiful screen! When did you make it, Susy?"

"'Never! no, never!'" sang Susan. "But let this be entre nous; and yet, I suppose 'tis of no use courting secrecy; one might just as well put it in the "Herald," and "Mirror;" for Miss Vane will look on one side of the screen, and then on me, and say: 'This screen, Miss Susan—how could you find time and patience to make anything so elaborate?' I would smile, and show her the border of my handkerchief, which I had purposely been tearing, and say, 'See, Miss Vane! one might just as well buy Lisle edgings, as that cheap thread-stuff of Lawrence and Smith. Don't you think it miserable?' She would say 'yes;' but still keep her eyes on my screen; and at length ask, in her desperate, disagreeable, hesitating way, 'This screen, Miss Susan—'tis beautiful! how could you—did you make it?' Didn't I catch just her tone, and look, and manner, Caroline? And she would touch the tip of her lilac glove like this."

"Perhaps so; but——"

"Nay! now, no lecture, if you please. I am not in the mood for it this morning. There comes the Lanes' carriage! I am vexed when I think of it

561

You know how intimate Abby and I used to be. And—would you believe it?—since they moved and set up their own carriage, they never call here. The last time I saw Abby, I met her in Broadway, and such a lofty bow! It was a mere toss like this; it had one advantage; it set her feathers to glancing finely."

"But, Susan, pray don't talk in this way, and mimic people," said Caroline, with a pained look. "It is beautiful out this morning. Let us take a long ramble. I long to go where we can feel the clear country air. Is that your bell?"

"Yes, the Lanes have stopped. See! they have put livery upon their servants. See the coachman's silver hatband! Isn't it meet that one open one's eyes and mouth thus, and hold one's breath thus? Nay! don't scold, ma cousine!"

"Your deshabille, Susan! let me help you dress, quick."

"Why, child, they have only left their card; and now away they roll. Let me see if they call on the Dodds. No, I was quite sure they would not. Ha! I will tell you about it. They called on Mrs. Dodd once after moving into their new house. The morning room was full of visitors; and among them were Esquire Lawton, his lady, and their hopeful, then just returned from Europe, you know; and with them several distingue people from Washington, relatives of theirs. And so the Lanes set about protruding themselves. Mrs. Lane talked learnedly about Palmo's, and Niblo's, and Socrates, and Diogenes, relating with a great deal of enthusiasm historical anecdotes familiar as A, B, C to most school-girls of these times at twelve. But poor Mrs. Lane has just been seized with literature, it seems; and so she fancies everybody in the very ignorance from which she is emerging. Mr. Lane strutted across the drawing-room, put one arm beneath the skirt of his coat, tumbled over the contents of a card-basket, and adpropos, as he said, began to talk about Wall Street, stocks, exchange, Great Britain, and France. And the innocent little Abby—you know she was Abigail three years ago—was fluttering about, protruding her black slipper, putting her hand and wrist into all sorts of curvatures, by touching the tip of her forefinger to her lip, or dipping it about in the mazes of a huge bouquet she bore, or touching papa or mamma's shoulder, by way of calling their thoughts from exchange and Socrates to a bruised flower in her bouquet, or a pretty eye, or a foot, or a pretty something in some plates she had purchased while out. Mrs. Dodd was so disgusted! especially when, at last, they dragged in opportunities of saying 'our new house,' 'Vesey Street,' 'our carriage,' and 'our domestics.' So she said, with that enviable nonchalance of which she is such a perfect mistress: 'You must be delighted with your change of residence, Mrs. Lane. Bowery, and particularly Bowery proper, where you resided so long, is such an ultima thule sort of place!' 'This was a temporary damper,' Mrs. Dodd says; but they soon rallied; and again it was 'our last dinner, our best friend Chancellor Norton, and our carriage.' And then Mrs. Dodd said: 'You must find it pleasant to command a carriage of your own, Mr. Lane, after hiring so long. Yours was a great bargain, too; we paid twice as much for our last one; oh! I recollect—yours was a second or third-hand.' This was a wholesome dose for their vanity. There was no more of it; but, quite crestfallen, they took leave, and have not repeated their call, and Mrs. Dodd is glad of it. Oh! there is nothing I hate as I do un parvenue. Don't you despise one, Caroline?"

"Oh dear! Susan, I do not know what I do. You have talked so long, so fast, and about so many things, I should think you would be completely bewildered. Come, now, let us go to your room. I will help you to dress, and then we will go where we can see trees, and the blue sky, and the sea! Oh, I long to breathe a clearer, cooler air! Come."

"Well—or, dear Carl, I will ring for Mary, and you sit here meanwhile and try my guitar; I have just got it home from Bullard's, where it has been under repair. See if it is not elegant now. And the sounds! you have no idea. My latest songs are below; but here are 'The Tyrolese Fortune-Teller,' and 'Away we bound o'er the deep,' and I don't know what else.

'Away! away we bound over the deep;
Lightly, brightly our merry hearts leap;
Homeward we sail to the land of our love,
By the star-light beacon shining above," sang the giddy creature, as she gave her bell-rope a jerk; and then, going backwards, she bowed and courtesied herself out of the room.

"Oh dear!" sighed Caroline, turning to the guitar; and the faint smile with which she met the parting salutations of her graceful cousin gave way to an expression of real sorrow. She saw with other eyes than Susan's. For her, the excessive thoughtlessness and vanity of her cousin, half destroying, as they did, all the advantages of her naturally clear understanding and good heart; the hollow, ridiculous pretensions of the Lanes, militating against the republican spirit of our institutions, and turning their rapidly accumulating property to such low purposes; the artful and malicious taunts of Mrs. Dodd, notwithstanding an education, a position in society, and religious professions which ought to have placed her far indeed above such a mode of rebuke and reform; all these, their causes and their legitimate results on individuals and on society, were full of the most heart-sickening influences. Oh that they were wise! would that she might do them good in some way! And the whole world—if she might only go, and in the ear, and to the heart of the giddy, whisper: "Ponder well the paths of thy feet;" of the proud, "Be not high-minded, but fear;" and of the seeker for this world's favor, "Come unto me; for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest for your souls!"

"Might I but do this!" she said, half aloud.

"Might you but do what, cousin?" asked Susan, laughing. She had that moment returned to the boudoir. "Confess now, Carl," continued she, as she rummaged some boxes that stood on her dressing-table—"might you but get a husband? or—or what? I would like to know where my gloves are. Mary has ransacked my chamber, and the parlor, and the hall. Ah! this is pleasant; here they are. Come, now, confess," she added, again laughing; "might you—why how spiritual you look, Caroline! You must have been thinking—Might I but go to Birmah, and convert the heathen!—But your eyes are full. Pardon me just this time, sweetest cousin, and I will try." She kissed Caroline, dropped a tear or two, and then in one moment was pulling on her tight gloves, and making all sorts of comic grimaces. "The truth is, Caroline, there is no use in all my trying. If I were with you, or Aunt Sarah, or Dr. Butler all of the time, it might succeed; but every other influence in Gotham is against me; and I am just weak enough to feel a sort of—of magnetic, I suppose it is—a sort of magnetic sympathy with whatever spirit takes hold of me. Heigh-ho! Well, hast tried my guitar, Caroline?"

Caroline shook her head.

"Well, another time. Come in this evening; or, this do. Come back here after our walk. We shall be almost starved, you know; and we shall take such comfort over our dinner! And then, 'when the day declineth, we will sit here, and sing, and be happy.'"

Caroline smiled and nodded assent, and arranged Susan's shawl.

"Thank you: your shawl is always correct. Papa says if you were to throw your things on, they would be sure to fall always in just the best mode; and I believe they would; but I am so short! I haven't room for things. Did you ever see such looking curls?"

'Away, away we bound over the deep;
Lightly, brightly our merry hearts—'

This is miserable! there come the Dunklees into the court, and up to our door. But we will wait here. Fifteen minutes is their rule; and if obliged to ransack every nook and corner of their dull brains for themes, they never leave a moment too soon; or if discussing Miss Lorena Ann's accomplishments, gained chiefly in one year at that miserable boarding-school of Mrs. Dearbon—by the way, the most fruitful topic they ever hit—they never stay one moment too long. But why—what makes you so uncommonly mute to-day? What have you been looking at?"

"I don't know," answered Caroline. "Who occupies the second floor of the brick house opposite?"

"The Starks. You see the sign below, 'Stark, Wainwright, & Co.' The Starks were from Yankee land some ten or a dozen years ago. I can just remember now how I laughed at the queer little 'jockey-cap their babe wore when they came. But such a fat, fair face, and such curls I never saw; and now she has grown the most splendid little gipsy in the world. I have longed to get at her when I have heard her laugh, so clear and ringing. We are not on terms, however; Mr. Stark's firm and papa's are rivals in trade, so they pass each other; and one never meets them in society. I conclude that they were from the woods direct: at any rate, they seem to prefer birds and flowers to people; for their parlor is at once parlor, aviary, and greenhouse. Ah! now I remember—I suppose Mrs. Stark is very ill: I have noticed the last two years that she has been growing paler and paler. I did not see her once all last winter; but Dr. Lane called every day, and, the first beautiful warm spring day, the parlor curtains were put farther back, a window was opened, and, as I sat here, I saw her husband bring her and seat her in an easy-chair close by the window. And such a look as hers was when she turned her large dark eyes up to the sky! Her face was as dazzlingly white as her deshabille, except a round spot in each cheek, and her lips, which were as red as a cherry. She looked like a beautiful spirit; and I could not avoid weeping as I sat here and thought how dreadful it was that she must so soon be 'barred from the day,' and from her husband, who is truly elegant, and who seems as tender of her as if she were a babe. But Miss Malone came in, and I brushed off my tears. She was infinitely amazed at the simplicity of my boudoir, described hers, told me about Amelia Ashton's divan, and Laura Hastings's toilet appointments, and Miss Vane's Psyche; and from that hour until last evening, when my improvements reached papa's 'Thus far and no farther,' I have thought of nothing but boudoirs and boudoir appendages. Ah! Caroline, I understand that look of yours. It is too bad, I know, to go on so, forgetting everything serious in scrambling after fashions and vanities. Eh bien! I sha'n't grow lachrymose about it. Come! there go the Dunklees. Now, 'Away, away we bound o'er'—Stop, Carl! let me take my parasol. Of one thing I am thoroughly convinced; that is, I was not made for a pattern lady. Where can my parasol be? I have tried, times without number, to be like you, as you know; and you know, and I know how I failed, and how ridiculous I made myself. No; do you be Minerva; that is your forte; for that your solid head and queenly form were made. But I—did you ever see anybody so short?—Aha! here is my parasol!—And just rap on my forehead, Caroline, and see if it is not hollow. But how serious you are this morning! There, now I am ready: do come now! When will we look upon the sea?"

There is freedom in the ocean,
There is spirit in the breeze
There is life in every motion
Of the ever-restless seas."

"Oh, don't sing so loud, Susan!" said Caroline, again withdrawing her eyes from the window. "See! there is a carriage at Mr. Stark's door, and a coffin!"

"Yes; and they are carrying it in. Dreadful! Mrs. Stark has gone, then. But how you tremble, dear Caroline! You surely don't allow yourself to be moved in this way at sight of every coffin?"

"Not of every one; but just like this my mother died: she too died in spring, when she was longing to go where she might see green fields, and trees, and flowers once more. I was only twelve, you know; but, as if it were yesterday, I remember all—her last kiss, and the blessings that came upon her last breath. Oh, could she but have lived, Susan! could even one of my parents but have been spared to me! You know not—God grant you never may learn by such an experience as mine—the reasons you have now to bless Him with every breath you draw."

Susan flung her arms around Caroline's neck, wept a few moments as if her heart were breaking, sobbed out broken and passionate assurances of sympathy and love for Caroline, of gratitude to Heaven, and of determinations to begin then to live a better life. But see how it all ended! At the Park, the cousins were met by Frank Vane and his sister, who had a thousand "airy nothings" to discuss with them. Were they at Mrs. Gilman's concert last evening?—were the Holmes's girls there?—did Adaline wear her new velvet?—was Park Howland as assiduous as ever in his devoirs to that inimitable Abby Lane?—Oh! Ah! Indeed! Well, they would part them.—After much more nonsense and sarcasm on the part of the Vanes and Susan—they would part then and there; but they would meet again to-morrow at the Bennet's grand dinner: au revoir, au revoir.

CHAPTER II.

SUSAN tried no more; or, it is not known to us, who see with the mortal eye, that she tried. She may have done it, for all that. Night may have known of tears running silently upon the pillows; and of "oh dears!" more than we could count; and of determinations to do something in the next twenty-four hours worth the doing; of saying something worth the saying—worth the being written in the Lamb's book. We can never know; for Night is dark and silent on such points; and the girl showed no fruits of repentance. There was no amendment: you never heard her speak, that she might not as well have been still, for all the good it did. Rich she was, or her father was rich, which was all the same, since to her reasonable desires he never shook his head, or said "No," or went on with his newspaper reading, saying never a word. There was no time when she could not go out with money in her purse; no time when she could not send John out with wood, coal, provisions, clothing; not in all that long, cold winter in New York, when cheeks grew hollow and purple with hunger and cold only a little way from their door; and when beseeching eyes were raised to hers, and thin, trembling hands held out from human beings whose hearts were making ready every moment for deeds of crime, by the growing desperation of their conditions, by the gnawing hunger, and by the thought of the little ones that waited at home. She never heeded them; or, if ever she did, no one knows it; it was only for a moment; not long enough for the benevolent thought to go out in the benevolent deed. Her head was so full of balls, dinners, and operas—of ball, dinner, and opera dresses! God forgive her that, of all he had given her, she had nothing for his needy children—nothing for the poor and sick of his earthly kingdom! God forgive her that she lived so many days and months of leisure and plenty, and yet went not one step forward, made herself not one grain wiser or happier than she was six months before! When Christmas came, she made unprecedented outlay in costly gifts for her wealthy friends. And this she might innocently have done if she had not "left the other undone," the other work of providing also gifts for the poor. She would leave "all that sort of thing" to Caroline and Mrs. Adlin, the good aunt with whom Caroline resided, she said, as she ran laughing and singing away.

Have my readers read that excellent thing of Dickens's, his "Christmas Carol?" Then do they not wish that on that Christmas evening, when Caroline and Susan sat each in her chamber at home, and fell asleep in her easy-chair of weariness—do they not wish that then Dickens's good old "Ghost of Christmas Present" might have come in his slippers to each by turns, taking them abroad through the streets, the close doors, and windows, whenever their Christmas words and works had gone, laying it all bare before them, what they had done, and what they had left undone? In a magnificent parlor, a few rods from her house, Susan would have heard it in ridiculously affected tones—"I absolutely can't think why Miss Allen sent this sort of thing here to me: we're not in the least intimate, you know," and all that. "But, isn't this a nice idea? I'll send it straight to that Miss Webber out in the woods somewhere, who sent me the moss work. Won't this be excellent?" The "thing" was a vase of shells, the chef-d'œuvre of Susan's Christmas operations. A little farther, she would have found a beautiful ring about being disposed of in pretty much the same summary way. She would have seen that a few things gave a real pleasure, were really prized: but, alas! this was where she cared least about giving a pleasure, least about bestowing a prize. Pity she didn't see this: the lesson would directly have made her a nobler, happier girl.

Caroline would have seen in more than one poor house such quiet lids, now that it was all over; now that they had had such a day and evening of warmth and plenty! She would have seen them in another home, children and all, still up, talking over the delights of the day, sitting far back; and a thing was this they could not often do, to sit away back in a large ring, some of them at the windows even—the room was so warmed through and through of that sweet Miss Norris's wood. They would love to sit up all night, not to have the warmth wasted; and it was so new, so good not to be jammed shivering together close by the little stove. Only think of it! there were, after all, plates full and plates full left; and wood enough to last them a fortnight; and by that time, why long enough before that time, Mrs. Hampden would be ready to pay them for that fine sewing, and Miss Lawrence for that washing; and father would be strong! by that time, wouldn't he? now he needn't be worrying about them; now they had such plates full, and such heaps of wood; and now the sweet Miss Norris was coming to see them every little while all winter. Wouldn't father be better? Yes, children, that we know now; because it happened that he was better directly. It was, in reality, only a slight indisposition. He just saw that his arm had less strength than was its wont; that sometimes, oftener than ever before, rheumatism ran along the cords; that continually day and night he felt fever and disquiet in his brain. This set him to thinking that he might soon be helpless. He probably would soon be helpless; and then, in all that great, wealthy city, there were none save the authorities who would look in on them, who would bury him out of the way if he died, or do anything for all that host of little ones, or for the faithful mother, whose strength was already so far spent with the toilsomeness of her way. These were freezing thoughts; and for a few days they acted like palsy on the poor man's heart and arms. It was the opportune kindness of our good Caroline that brought him out of it, and made him straightway a sound man.

There was one home not of what we call absolute want. The widow Mansen and her two daughters had a tidy room on the third floor of a third-rate house. By being every minute of the day and far into the night over their needles, they met Want always on the threshold, and sent the meagre wretch away. They were never hungry, or thirsty, or cold, that they had not the means of supplying at least that day's need. One may be grateful for this; and in their gratefulness, in their hope of the freedom, the rest, and the enjoyment of Heaven, they may be happier a million times than the rich—about them who never give thanks, whose hopes and pleasures are all built on this ever-jostling foundation called Earth. But there was a want that often became a gnawing pain, especially in the heart of the daughter, for beauty, for beauty in their home, for flowers, pictures; and oh, for books! for leisure to read them! O God, for these!—for a tittle of that which was trodden under foot as of nothing worth in the home across the way! But Caroline found them; Caroline found them! She heard young Vane wishing that, somewhere among “the Upper Ten,” he could find such large, lustrous, heavenly eyes as that sewing girl had in her pretty, little, haughty head. Gad! or if she had “the tin,” and not the station; but—whew! whew! where were his gloves? Would his sister and Miss Susan just help him to find his gloves? He was going to see if he could scare up a party of wild, good fellows for some sort of a scrape or other. He must get that Mansen girl's eyes out of his heart some way. Not again should he be persuaded to go to the widow's, if the work to be brought was as rich as a Golconda diamond. It might be broken; it had better be than his heart. Whew! as revoir, ladies. With this, he took himself from the room, laughing, and yet with a flushed face and unquiet eyes.

If the Ghost had taken Caroline to the widow's room that evening, she would have seen nothing new except that table between the widow and her daughter. But it was all they could have asked in the whole world. They did not want anything else; they were so grateful in the thought that their longing was appreciated, that there was one in that city who thought their privations something, even though they did not actually freeze, actually starve. The table was new, and ran lightly on its castors, so that by day it could be wheeled into the sunlight, for the sake of a thing of matchless beauty budding and blossoming there, a marble rose; and, by night, to the centre of the room near the stove, that the rose, the large volumes, the “Magazine,” and the “Journal,” might be between the widow and her daughter, beneath the light of the new lamp. It was an unusual thing in that room, such a light as that large lamp gave. And this was an unusual thing, having in a can oil enough to supply it plentifully into the short spring evenings. Caroline would not have heard many words; but she would have seen that Mrs. Mansen could not read at all for the tears in her eyes; that, at length, she gave up trying, and sat and rocked with her eyes on the sweet face opposite, bent low over the volume she was reading. And presently she would have heard a voice sweet as the face itself say: “Oh mamma! hear this:—‘But there is a far higher likeness to Christ than the artist ever drew or chiselled. It exists in the heart of his true disciple. The true disciple surpasses Raphael and Michael Angelo. The latter have given us Christ's countenance in fancy, and, at best, having little likeness to the mild beauty and majestic form which moved through Judea. But the disciple who sincerely conforms himself to the disinterestedness, and purity, and filial worship, and all-sacrificing love of Christ, gives us no fancied representation, but the true, divine lineaments of his soul, the very spirit which beamed in his face, which spoke in his voice, which attested his glory as the Son of God." Then she would have seen the large eyes fill, and the large tears go drop, drop upon the page.

As it was, as no Ghost of Christmas Present came, Caroline saw and heard none of these things; but she knew that others were happy for what she had done; that she was happy; and she lay down in peace.

CHAPTER III.

SUMMER came, and the poor thought the city a paradise, because there were no cold days and nights; no long, dark evenings: because work was more plenty and wants were less pressing; but the rich could never endure such heat and such prostration. Hence, they betook themselves one way and another to watering-places, or to friends in the country. Caroline and Susan had tried Saratoga, Rockaway, and Newport, at different seasons. This year they would go up the Hudson to Uncle Joseph's. They were there—the uncle, aunt, and cousins—in the quaintest of all houses, on a large farm that their united industry had made to "blossom like the rose." They were kind and intelligent. They loved to see the nieces there, going through the rooms filling the vases, arranging the books, playing with the children, instructing them—not by regular lessons, but incidentally as they frolicked and talked—sitting down quietly and sewing, now making the new garment, and anon tucking bits of braid, or fringe and buttons on the old, taking the children—all but the baby, and they begged altogether to take her too, she was such a darling—to a sail, walk, or carriage-drive. It made Aunt May's head whirl as she stood with baby in her arms, seeing the girls and their oldest boy, Henry, go galloping and "cutting the air" on those wild young creatures. "No more fit for a woman to ride!" she always said. But Uncle Joseph was lifted in the air by the daring, the sublimity of the thing; and the boys swung their hats and cheered.

Uncle Joseph's folks had a room full of children, from Henry, who was sixteen years old, down to the little Mary, who was less than two; but there were never too many of them. Look at any one of them, and you would be sure that that one could not be spared; the house would be sad enough, if it were not for that one, with his or her peculiar ways, measures, and amiabilities. As it was, there were berries, trout, birds of game, frolics, surprises, outcries, outlaughes, torn frocks and pants enough to keep mouths, fingers, and brain ever interested, ever busy. They were never still, except in the morning, and again at evening, when Uncle Joseph said, with his good, persuasive voice: "Let us all unite in prayer." Then every face was thoughtful and subdued in a moment; every little knee was bent, every childish voice said Amen, and in such loving tones that it always sent a thrill through Susan's heart. Those parents with hands as hard as a shell, and with the sweat of labor for ever on their brows, those little children even, kept God always near them, saw Him in all their bountiful supplies of fruit, flowers, and grain, trusted in Him, and felt no fear. It was He that blessed them in all things; hence there was no pride, no vain-glory in their successes. Susan felt it more and more every day, that, in coming near them, He also came near her, waited for her, held out a father's hand to her, and said, ever plainer and plainer, "Daughter, give me thine heart." If she went abroad—and it was all the same if she sat within—through the open windows and doors, she heard all the birds, and every living thing praise Him. The river went by bright and glorious, telling of the mighty hand that gathered its waters. She only, with all her gifts, and her conscience upbraiding her for her frivolousness, bent no knee, gave no thanks, asked no blessing, wasted the days and the years. She wept herself asleep thinking of this; and the next morning, when Uncle Joseph said "Let us pray," she knelt with them and again wept. Soon she was a new creature. She saw a new and glorious beauty in nature, a new and glorious interest in life. There was no more ill-natured mimicry, or fault-finding. If one was vain, another foolish, and yet another frivolous, so was she all of these until the Lord helped her to be wise.

CHAPTER IV.

"ANGEL," her young friends called Susan when they returned to the city, such a beautiful light was in her eye, such a beautiful harmony and pleasantness pervaded her whole being. Some, however, would curl their lip; but the distortion did not come legitimately; it was, in reality, no disgust they felt that Susan was so mild, so full of light, such an "angel." She did them good, all of them. It was more here, and less there; but all were better, if only in a trifling degree, for coming near her. It did them good when, in a few months, they stood so many of them in her death-chamber, and saw that certainly she was not too much an angel, none too pure and godlike for the presence she was soon to enter. She blessed them all, begged them to give themselves to God then. They ought to love Him, she told them with a choking voice, He was so good to them; and they never would be truly happy until they did, never. It was the old story. They had all heard it from the pulpit, from aged lips; they had seen it in books; yet it was a new thing coming from that young friend, the dear, the beloved one; and it melted them as nothing had ever melted them before. She died with a heavenly peace in her uplifted eyes and on her tongue; and her young friends went onward in life, He only, "who searcheth the heart, seeing it exemplified in them the blessedness of Susan's regenerated life, and of her triumphant death."

CHAPTER V.

MANY years have passed since then. Then it was '34, now it is '48; fourteen years have passed; and if you go now to the old home of Susan, the parents are not there. Go up to Uncle Joseph's; and there you will find them across the way, in the loveliest spot of all that lovely region; close by the river in the midst of all those voices that once were in their beloved daughter's ear. They love to think of this; they would never be willing to live anywhere else; in no other spot on the earth could they have made the grave of Susan. The grave—you can see the white monument there among the willows, close by the river. Uncle Joseph's youngest, named for their Susan, is almost always with them. They spoil her, the neighbors say; but they do not. They are no longer blind in their movements. They know that it is an immortal one they lead about by the hand, take to their arms, their table, and the little cot close beside their own bed. No, the parents could not live anywhere else, now Susan is away.

Go back to the city; and there in the former home of the Vanes you will find the widow Mansen, her daughter, and her daughters—but no matter; 'tis a long story about the daughter; and there is here no room for it. Mrs. Mansen is no better, and it may be not vastly happier, in the main, than when it was

"Work—work—work,
Till the brain began to swim:
Work—work—work,
Till the eyes were heavy and dim!"

We would not have thought the change in her condition worth naming, only it minds us afresh that, in this new republic, we are all, as it were, on Ixion's wheel; so that, if we find ourselves looking down on people at present, we may as well be humble, not only for humility's sweet sake, but because by and by we may be coming down, down; and those who erst were below us may be going up, up far enough over our heads. The bankruptcy of the Vanes would have been infinitely easier to bear if there had been no arrogance, no foolish pride in the day of their strength.

The reverse in Mrs. Mansen's fortune came of her only brother, who, ten years ago, returned from Russia, where he had made a fortune. He was "rich as a Jew," and it was for this consummation he had been toiling all those long years. But he was not in the least happy, since no pleasant lips ever turned to him and said—husband, father, brother, or uncle. He came home; and, after a long search, found his sister and niece in the home of Caroline, whence good Aunt Odlin had departed.

It was pleasant that Caroline took the widow and orphan under her hand. There had been mutual comfort in the thing all along; and then in the end Caroline married the old bachelor from Russia. This would have been no lucky dénouement, as marrying a rich bachelor merely; but nowhere else in the world could she have found a companion so perfectly suited to her, with such a noble face and figure, so highly intellectual, and above all so loving and kind; fond of travel like herself, and like herself no less fond of sitting quietly in their own room, reading, and talking of what they read, what they had seen in their travels, and laying plans with her for the relief of the poor of the city. Mrs. Mansen was their almoner; and she went chiefly among the sewing women. She knew what they suffered; and she had determined that the rest of her life should be given to them.

Caroline has two babies, beauties! and such lovely things! You would not think it of such a tidy, magnificent man as her husband—that is, if you have no good brother, brother-in-law, or husband who does the same—but he does lie on the carpets often, and let the children crawl over him. Mothers know how much this is worth to Caroline. Their gambols afford her a pleasant diversion; she has many a hearty laugh over them. Besides, she is able, while they go on, to fold her hands and rest; feeling thankful that it is not of necessity that all amusements beyond those furnished by the hired nurse must come from her, whether she is strong or weak, disposed to laugh, or only to read quietly, or look in the grate with her thoughts back in the olden time, when there were parents and childhood's home for her, when the dear Susan lived, and especially when she died.

SONNET.—WATER.

BY WM. ALEXANDER.

MYSTERIOUS Fluid! claim'st thou highest praise
By power penetrative thou art everywhere!
Where matter is, there thou—in earth, in air
Perchance, too, where gleam Fire's red flashing rays
Thy viscous nature makes our houses stand.
Deprived of thee, wood into ashes turns,
Stones crumble into dust. The sparkling urns,
Where thou, in love, invitingly dost stand,
Are richest treasure to both poor and proud;
And sandy deserts can thy value tell,
Where nations strive to gain some cold deep well;
Whence gusheth thou with silvery voice and loud—
In rills and rivers through the woods thou goest;
Carrying life and joy and health where'er thou flowest.

THE LESSON DREAM.

BY W. WALLACE DAVIS.

When the shades were coming
Over vale and hill;
When the busy humming
Of the world was still,
And upon the wood-side
Sang the whippoorwill;
When the stars were peeping—
Peeping clear and bright,
Like lovers' eyes when keeping Vigils through the night—
Then my closing eyelids
Somnus did invite.

In my sleep, I pondered
On thy love for me;
In my dreams, I wandered
Over land and sea—
Wandered in my dreams, love,
Hand in hand with thee—
Wandered where the posies
Shed an odor rare,
Where myrtle-bloom and roses
Scented sweet the air,
And fairy notes were pealing
From the songsters there.

Soon thy form grew lighter,
Wings thy shoulders bore;
Then thy eyes grew brighter,
Lighter than before,
And a smile seraphic
All the features wore;
Thy voice grew softer, sweeter,
And its music broke,
In rhapsody of metre,
In accents that bespoke
All thy heart's affection—
All my love awoke.

Then this lesson learned I—(Thou didst it impart)—
"Man's bliss is only earned by Woman's gentler heart,
And incomplete his destiny
When she shapes no part.
She has power given,
Power over strife,
Power sent from Heaven
To harmonize this life:
God's best gifts to man are Mother, sister, wife!

Waking soon, and thinking
Of this shadowy theme,
Straight I went to linking
Fact to fancy's gleam:
I chose to shape my destiny
The partner of my dream,
And I prayed of Heaven
That this chosen guide

Might to me be given,
Might become my bride,
Might be sent to bless me
Clinging to my side.

"GOD MUST BE MERCIFUL TO KINGS."

("Last Days of the Emperor Alexander," by Dumas.)

BY M. H. FORTUNE.

A NATION weeps—he heeds them not—
The monarch of the Russias wide
Has laid him down to die amid
The emblems of his regal pride.

Rich velvets of imperial hue
Fall round his couch in many a fold,
And kingly splendor all is there,
In brilliant tints and burnished gold.

But what avail the gorgeous rooms,
Or fringing gold that decks his bed,
When he who owns them all must soon
Commingle with the mould'ring dead?

Or what avails, though thousands weep,
The hour that calls him from his throne?
They cannot hold him from the grasp
Of Death, now calling for his own.

But to the humble, lowly priest,
Ah! list the words he uttered then:
"God must be merciful to kings—
They need it more than other men."

Yes, here is truth! the poorest one
Who toils amid the laboring band
Dreams not the temptings that assail
The monarch with a sceptred hand.

The sleepless nights, the weary days,
The thousand fears a sceptre brings,
Oh! well the Emperor might say,
"God must be merciful to kings!"

DISTRUST.—A SONNET.

BY MARY G. WELLS.

WHY wilt thou wrong, with jealous doubts and fears,
The heart that is so truly all thine own?
Why cause me shed those wild and burning tears
That ever flow at thy reproachful tone?
An orphan lone, thou'rt all my soul holds dear:
Hast thou a pang that is not felt by me?
Have I a pleasure when thou art not near?
I know no joy that is not shared with thee.
Dost judge me by thyself? Art thou grown cold,
And thus wouldst grieve my trustful love away?
If so—ah! let the tale be quickly told;
My haughty spirit will not brook delay.
My passion is too deep for words to prove:
Then cease to doubt me, or I cease to love!

BALLAD.

BY J. E. CARNES.

DARKLY fatal, O Havana!
Was thy green and fertile shore;
Sadly shall thy name's sweet music
Seem unto us evermore.

Gallant forms were grouped upon thee,
Victims of deceptive wile,
Doomed to death, yet on each visage
Shone the hero's scornful smile.

Earth was gorgeous to their vision,
Rich her summer robe was wrought
And from all thy groves of orange
Bland perfumes thy breezes brought.

Castle, tower, and fragrant garden
Lay in summer's brightest hue,
And the bending heaven above them
Seemed to wear its calmest blue.

Spread before them smiled the ocean,
Chainless in his giant pride,
And the hearts within their bosoms
Were as chainless as his tide.

Sadly gazed their thought beyond it,
And each lid repressed a tear
O'er the sudden fate that blasted
Hopes of many a blissful year.

One last look at earth's green vesture,
And at ocean's boundless flood,
Ere thy altars, dark Deception,
Are besprinkled with their blood.

One last dream of friends and kindred,
And of graves beyond the sea,
Beneath the flag whose starry splendor
Lights the pathway of the free.

Stood they there in moveless courage,
Heroes of Spartan mould;
Rang the death-shots, and the victims
In the dust together rolled!

Darkly fatal, O Havana!
Was thy green and fertile shore;
Sadly shall thy name's sweet music
Seem unto us evermore!

THE SLEEPER WHO IS DREAMING.

Inscribed to Oliver Oakwood.

BY MRS. A. F. LAW.

BEND softly o'er the sleeper, for she dreameth of the past,
And, 'neath its spells of cloudless joy, her fevered pulse Bounds fast!

Bend softly! From her parted lips unconscious murmurs steal,

And these low whispers, gently breathed, time's secrets now reveal.

With tuneful voice she blends their names—the faithless and the true—

Uniting close the severed wreath which love once round them threw.

VOL. XLV.—49

Oh! wherefore doth she revel thus 'mid glowing scenes of yore!

In one short moment she will wake to weep—and dream
no more!

The present brings no blissful hours—around it all is dim—
While echo syllables the notes of sorrow's mournful hymn.

Peace, peace to thee, fair slumberer! From fickle love and grief,

Within sleep's pure and blest embrace thou fain wouldst find relief;

Her dewy breath with lulling power is wafted o'er thee now.
And with her lips she presses still thy pale and anxious brow.

Alas! not all her winning charms can ease thy yearning heart;

For see! beneath those folded lids the quivering tear-drops start;

Life's masquerade hath wearied thee—thy bosom heaveth high,

And from the source of thrilling thought ascends a troubled sigh.

Thou'rt parting with the spirit-strains which gave thy visions birth,

And once again thy soaring mind must captive bend to earth.

Ah! child of clay, this world for thee will yield no tranquil joy;

Its treasures rare, its wealth of bliss, are mixed with base alloy!

And Memory, with deep anguish fraught, will darken every hour,

While Passion's fell and withering blight will fade Hope's budding flower.

I would that I might win for thee unbroken, calm repose,
Or, by some magic, deck thy path with colors of the rose!

Though vain the wish—I yet may breathe affection's fervent prayer,

That in the healing balm of Heaven thy soul may largely share.

And, when thou leav'st this earthly bourn, there seek thy rest, poor dove,

And fold thy weary pinions in a home of peace and love!

EROS.

BY R. T. CONRAD.

YOUNG holy Love! It riseth o'er the heart,

Like morn's flushed glory o'er a vernal sky;

And from its light all things profane depart,
Leaving thoughts pure and aspirations high—

The hallowing effluence of Divinity!

Its heart-founts, clear as rills in Eden bowers,

Ruffled alone by joy's low, quivering sigh,

Wake, as they leave their paradise of flowers,

Ward melodies, else mute, in this wild world of ours.

Each other's, and all God's! The sacred vow

Blends souls, like meeting streams or mingling rays;

And lapsing life glides by with music's flow,

Till age, like moonlight, silvers o'er their days.

God on their holy home His blessing lays:

And when the bow that o'er their youth was bent,

The mingled glory of their souls, decays,

Its hues are with immortal radiance bent;

They melt—but 'tis in light: Heaven claims the love it lent!

TO HER WHO UNDERSTANDS IT.

BY ADALISA CUTTER.

BELOVED one, at this quiet eve,
Ere sinks yon trembling star to rest,
One little song for thee I'll weave,
Of love-thoughts glowing in my breast.
I'll open all this full, warm heart,
That thou its inmost shrine can see,
With all its folded leaves apart,
Where nestle such sweet thoughts of thee.

I sit alone, and yet I seem
To see thee linger by my side,
As in some pleasant, quiet dream
Spirits of loved ones round me glide.
My hand is gently clasped in thine,
I listen to your loving tone;
I feel your warm lips pressed to mine,
And feel that I am not alone.

At first I strove to keep my heart
From loving thee—I knew too well
That we had only met to part,
And that we soon must breathe farewell:
I knew that on life's solemn main
Fate soon our little barks must sever,
And that we might not meet again
For years—perchance no more forever.

I strove in vain. Go bid the bird
Beside its nest forbear to sing;
Go bid the flowers, by soft winds stirred,
Forget to blossom in the spring;
Go bid the bright stars cease to shine,
Like diamonds in the blue above—
As well as bid this heart of mine
Give up its blissful dream of love.

Oh, were it wise to shun the flowers
Because their beauty fades so soon—
To wish there were no summer hours
Because it is not always June—
To turn away from the blue sky,
That shines so gloriously fair,
Because, to dim the sun's bright eye,
Dark threatening clouds are sometimes there!

No—rather cull the flowers that bloom,
And wear them, though for one brief day;
Their fragrance may dispel our gloom,
E'en when their beauty fades away.
Thoughts of the calm blue summer skies,
The rich green leaf, the sweet wild-flower,
Will come to us when storms arise,
And cheer full many a wintry hour.

E'en thus will thought of thee, sweet friend,
Remain when thou art far away;
And when the shades of eve descend,
When cooling sephyras gently play,
I'll sit beneath yon star's pale beams,
Or 'neath the soft light of the moon,
And yield myself to dreams, sweet dreams,
Of days that passed too soon—too soon.

And when beneath a southern sky,
'Mid birds and flowers your footsteps roam,
Sometimes will not your spirit's eye
Turn to my cherished mountain home?

Though scenes more fair, though friends more dear
Hereafter bless your earthly lot,
One boon I ask without one fear—
I ask thee to forget me not.

Oh, let me meet thy bark once more—
If not upon life's changeable sea,
At least upon that blissful shore,
From storm and tempest ever free.
Yes, if I ever reach that land,
(Oh, heed my best, my holiest prayer,)
Attended by some angel band,
Oh meet me there—oh, meet me there!

A FAREWELL TO SUMMER.

BY ELSIE GREY.

FAREWELL, bright Summer! Ay, I call thee bright,
Though to my dull dark soul the word is strange;
Let Hope soft breathe it, but not cold Despair.
Farewell, I say; yet would I find some word
Of deeper woe to speak my parting now
With thee, O Summer, passing here away.
Summer, thy last mild moon hath risen, and waxed,
And waned since that dread hour when in my soul
Hope's last faint taper, dying long, expired.
Summer, farewell! yet not for aye, for thou
Wilt come again, and thy warm breath will pass
O'er frozen trees and flowers, and they shall live.
But to my dark, dead, icy heart thou canst
Not come, nor thy soft breath shall kindle more
That light of Hope forever now gone out.

SONNET.—THE APPROACH OF WINTER.

BY JOHN S. MOORE.

FAREWELL now to the glories of the year!
The cloudiness of Winter cometh o'er us,
And nothing save the spring-tide will restore us
An ardent sunbeam. All the leaves, grown sear,
Drop dead to the ground 'neath the cold glow
Of a far-gleaming moon. The quiet stars,
Like peris gazing through a prison's bars,
Seem shivering as they cast regards below.
The music from the leaves, and from the grass,
Which filled the years upon a summery night,
Is now but all too mute. Ere long will pass
The vehement north-wind, conscious of his might,
Over the dead-cold land, and on my glass
The fingers of the fresh brown Autumn's fate will write

SONNET.—IN MEMORY OF "AMELIA.

BY G. WALLINGFORD CLARKE.

Ys heavenly spirits who preside o'er song,
Ne'er will ye cease to grieve—for in your bowers
No more that voice shall ring, whose tuneful powers
Thrilled with such ecstasy the list'ning throng.
Yet, mourned enchantress of the lyre, as long
As thy loved stars illumine, and dewy flowers
With fragrance fill the vales, soft falling showers
Refresh the earth, and snow-clad mountains strong
Lift their pale pinnacles to pierce the skies,
Thy lays shall live in all their native bloom,
And as a household word thy name be known.
Oh! songstress of the soul, with tearful eyes,
Whilst sounds in fancy's ear thy harp's deep moan,
I place this cypress wreath—this tribute on thy tomb!

LADY'S TRAVELLING-BAG, IN STRAW-WORK.

Materials.—A strip of French canvas, No. 14,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  inches wide; half an ounce each of five shades of green Berlin wool; 36 yards of straw beading; quarter of a yard of wide green glacé silk, to match with one of the darker shades of wool; sarsnet to line the same; a piece of stout cardboard;  $1\frac{1}{4}$  yard of fancy straw trimming an inch wide; and  $1\frac{1}{2}$  yard of satin ribbon to match the silk.

THESE baskets are at once among the prettiest and the most useful of the day. They are generally made of plain straw, instead of Berlin-work; but the latter has so elegant an appearance that we are sure our friends will think it well repays them for the little extra trouble.

It is to be understood that the lower part alone is done on canvas; the upper part is a bag of silk; the joining of the two is concealed by a piece of wide fancy straw laid on.

Narrow canvas is to be used for the bags in preference to a strip of the same width cut from a broader piece, because the selvages add so much to the strength of the basket.

Work across the width, first from right to left and then from left to right, so that the straw beading need not be cut at the end of the rows.

The pattern contains 20 rows. Begin with the darkest shade, and change at the 5th, 9th, 13th, and 17th; at the commencement of the next pattern (the 21st row), resume the darkest shade.

1st row.—Hold one end of the straw beading over two threads of the canvas, and work thus: 6 stitches taken across the straw in a straight line; consequently, across two upright threads of canvas, but not crossing any in the width; miss 3 threads, 12 stitches, miss 5 threads, 4 stitches, miss 3 threads, 2 stitches, miss 9 threads, 2 stitches, miss 11 threads, 10 stitches, miss 3 threads, 6 stitches.

[In future rows, it will be understood that threads are missed, and that s signifies stitches.]

2d.—Worked the reverse way. 4 s, miss 7, 6 s, miss 7, 8 s, miss 9, 4 s, miss 5, 4 s, miss 3, 8 s, miss 7, 4 s.

3d.—6 s, miss 3, 10 s, miss 3, 6 s, miss 3, 6 s, miss 7, 2 s, miss 3, 2 s, miss 5, 12 s, miss 3, 6 s.

4th.—16 s, miss 7, 4 s, miss 7, 2 s, miss 3, 12 s, miss 3, 20 s.

5th.—20 s, miss 3, 8 s, miss 3, 6 s, miss 9, 2 s, miss 9, 14 s.

6th.—6 s, miss 3, 10 s, miss 3, 2 s, miss 11, 2 s, miss 13, 4 s, miss 3, 10 s, miss 3, 6 s.

7th.—4 s, miss 7, 16 s, miss 9, 2 s, miss 3, 2 s, miss 3, 2 s, miss 5, 2 s, miss 5, 6 s, miss 7, 4 s.

8th.—6 s, miss 3, 8 s, miss 11, 6 s, miss 3, 8 s, miss 7, 14 s, miss 3, 6 s.

9th.—20 s, miss 11, 2 s, miss 3, 2 s, miss 5, 6 s, miss 3, 2 s, miss 5, 16 s.

10th.—14 s, miss 5, 10 s, miss 3, 2 s, miss 3, 2 s, miss 3, 6 s, 22 s.

11th.—6 s, miss 3, 10 s, miss 11, 2 s, miss 9, 2 s, miss 3, 4 s, miss 5, 12 s, miss 3, 6 s.

12th.—4 s, miss 7, 8 s, miss 3, 4 s, miss 5, 4 s, miss 9, 8 s, miss 7, 6 s, miss 7, 4 s.

13th.—6 s, miss 3, 12 s, miss 5, 2 s, miss 3, 2 s, miss 7, 6 s, miss 3, 6 s, 10 s, miss 3, 8 s.

14th.—20 s, miss 3, 12 s, miss 3, 2 s, miss 6, 4 s, miss 6, 16 s.

15th.—14 s, miss 9, 2 s, miss 9, 6 s, miss 3, 8 s, miss 3, 20 s.

16th.—6 s, miss 3, 10 s, miss 3, 4 s, miss 13, 2 s, miss 11, 2 s, miss 3, 10 s, miss 3, 6 s.

17th.—4 s, miss 7, 6 s, miss 5, 2 s, miss 5, 2 s, miss 3, 2 s, miss 3, 2 s, miss 9, 16 s, miss 7, 4 s.

18th.—6 s, miss 3, 14 s, miss 7, 3 s, miss 3, 6 s, miss 11, 8 s, miss 3, 6 s.

19th.—16 s, miss 5, 2 s, miss 3, 6 s, miss 5, 2 s, miss 3, 2 s, miss 11, 20 s.

20th.—22 s, miss 5, 6 s, miss 3, 2 s, miss 3, 2 s, miss 3, 10 s, miss 5, 14 s.

This completes one pattern, and must be repeated as often as desired for the size of the basket.

Cut out in cardboard an oval, pointed at both ends, about 12 to 14 inches long, and  $3\frac{1}{2}$  to 5 wide. Cover this with silk on both sides, and sew the straw-work all round it, having previously added a silk bag to the canvas. The cardboard should be sewed in very strongly, and the seam may be covered with straw beading.

The handle, which is made of the fancy straw, should be stiffened with a bit of wire ribbon, and firmly sewed on the centre of each side of the basket. The fancy straw is also to be put round the top of the canvas to conceal the joining of it with the silk.

KNITTED ARTIFICIAL FLOWERS.

CONVOLVULUS.

Four needles are required.

Take some pale yellow split wool, and cast on six stitches on each of two needles, and three stitches on the third needle, knit two plain rounds.

3d round.—Knit one, make one, knit one, make one, knit two, make one, knit one, make one, knit two, make one, knit one, make one, knit two, make one, knit one, make one, knit two, make one, knit one, make one, knit two, plain rounds.

6th.—Take a deeper shade of yellow; knit two, make one, knit one, make one, knit four, make one, knit one, make one, knit four, make one, knit one, make one, make one, knit four, make one, knit one, make one, knit four, make one, knit one, make one, knit two, knit three plain rounds; take white wool and knit one more round.

11th.—Knit three, make one, knit one, make one, knit six, make one, knit one, make one, knit six, make one, knit one, make one, knit six, make one, knit one, make one, knit six, make one, knit one, make one, knit three, knit three plain rounds with white, then take pale blue (half twist silk may be introduced with good effect), knit one more plain round.

15th.—Knit four, make one, knit one, make one, knit eight, make one, knit one, make one, knit eight, make one, knit one, make one, knit eight, make one, knit one, make one, knit eight, make one, knit one, make one, knit four. Take a deeper shade of blue, knit three plain rounds. Take a still deeper shade, and knit two rounds. Cast off very loosely.

The flower thus finished will be found divided into five stripes, by the increase stitches. Take a piece of wire, and sew it as neatly as possible along the edge of the top of the flower as far as the first stripe, turn down both ends of the wire. Take a second piece, and sew it from the first to the second stripe, turn down the ends, and contrive the same for the third, fourth, and fifth stripes. Sew down all the ends of wire two by two, on the wrong side of the flower. Sew up the side left open. The right side of the knitting will be the inside of the flower. Cover the lower end of the flower with fine herring-bone stitches to form a small calyx; tie up five bits of yellow wool, not split, with a knot at the top of each; fix them on a bit of wire to make the stamen, and place them in the centre of the flower, and cover the stem with green wool.

BUDS.

Cast on four stitches in pale green wool.

1st row.—Purl.

2d.—Make one, knit one, repeat through the row.

3d.—Purl.

4th.—Knit plain.

5th.—Purl.

6th.—Make one, knit two, repeat through the row.

7th.—Purl.

8th.—Use two threads of blue wool, together with two green, and knit the row, putting the wool twice round the needle. Gather all the stitches with a rug needle, then cut a small round of card, prick four holes in the centre, put two pieces of wire cross-wise through the four holes, twist the wire tight under the card, and cover the little card with green or blue wool, as if winding it. Cover this with the knitted piece for the bud. Sew up the open side, gather together the stitches of the open part, and cover the stem with green wool.

LEAF.

Cast on three stitches.

1st row.—Purl.

2d.—Knit plain.

3d.—Purl.

4th.—Make one, knit rest of row plain.

5th.—Make one, purl the row.

6th.—Knit plain.

7th.—Purl row.

8th.—Knit row.

9th.—Purl row.

10th.—Make one, knit rest of row.

11th.—Make one, purl rest of row.

12th.—Knit row.

13th.—Purl row.

14th.—Knit row.

Continue to knit and purl alternate rows, decreasing one stitch at the beginning of each, until only three stitches remain; knit these as one, and sew a fine wire neatly round the leaf, always leaving a little bit at the beginning and ending as a stalk.

This will form a leaf of middling size, but a variety of sizes and shades of color will be required to form a branch.

CLOAKS AND UNDERSLEEVES.

Fig. 1.

As was predicted in an earlier number, velvet ribbon has become the favorite style of trimming for all heavier materials, whether formed into cloaks or dresses. We give a beautiful cloak, the Sontag, trimmed in this way, as Fig. 1.

The shape, it will be seen, is a large, full sacque, tight on the shoulders, and falling into a full, open sleeve. It may be made of merino, cloth, or cashmere. The trimming, which is very full, nearly covering the sacque, is of alternate rows of narrow silk braid and velvet ribbon, of the same color as the cloak. Dark green, different shades of browns, fawns, claret, and blue, are the favorite colors. Silk will be found much warmer than cambric muslin in lining a cloak, though the latter is often used, faced with silk. A good Florence will be found much warmer and softer than a richer silk, and is most generally preferred, even in the most elegant

French cloaks. The wadding is cotton, in thin sheets, and should be quilted to the lining in front, and tacked in squares or diamonds through the cloak. The lining is now of the same shade as the outside, or of simple white. Contrasting colors are more rarely used.

As open sleeves are worn as much as ever, we give two neat and pretty styles of undersleeves. Both, it will be seen, conform to the curve of the arm.

No. 1.

No. 1 is of fine Swiss muslin, with a double ruffle or frill, lightly embroidered, of the same, following the opening on the back of the wrist, which suits sleeves cut in the mousquetaire style, opening to the elbow.

No. 2 is nearly the same in shape, but is made of lace, with a rich lace edging following the square

No. 2.

cut at the hand, and this is edged by a frill of lace two inches in depth, which has a softening and elegant effect on the hand and arm, and also displays the bracelet, which is now almost universally worn with open sleeves, either of velvet, plaited hair, or gold.

Both the above styles are new and extremely graceful. They may be made up in nearly any thin material to look well.

CAMBRIC EMBROIDERY.

We give a very rich pattern of English or cambric embroidery, which can all be done with piercing the holes, or cutting out the larger ones, and working them round. It is more particularly suited for underclothes, as it will wear as long as the article itself, which ordinary cambric edging will not do. For the bottoms of children's dresses, or pantalettes, it will be found to answer equally well. In our next number we shall give a different pattern in the same style; also one for insertion.

EDITORS' TABLE.

LETTER FROM CONSTANTINOPLE.

BY REV. H. G. O. DWIGHT.

[The following letter is so full and satisfactory in relation to our plan of Female Medical Missionaries, that we feel great pleasure in laying it before our readers. They will bear in mind the "Appeal to American Christians," &c., published in the March number of our "Book." A copy of this was shown to the Rev. Mr. Dwight, and here is his opinion of the plan.—Ed. L. B.]

CONSTANTINOPLE, May 13, 1852.

TO MRS. PETER.*

MY DEAR MRS. PETER: I feel exceedingly obliged to you for the perusal of Mrs. Hale's "Appeal to American Christians on behalf of the Ladies' Medical Missionary Society." It may be supposed by some that, situated as we missionaries are, in a far-off land, and under the constant pressure of occupation in our own appropriate work, we have little time or disposition to watch the progress of things in America; but I can say with truth that nothing that is going on there escapes our notice. We are well supplied with newspapers and magazines, and you may be assured that we use them to some purpose. And among the wise and benevolent projects which have been started in America of late years, that of providing the means of giving to females a medical education, for practice among their own sex, has attracted my particular attention, and from the first moment I heard of it I gave it my unqualified approbation. I trust the time is now near at hand when this branch of practice in America will be, where it always should have been, in the hands of females alone.

But what I wish very briefly to say to you in the present communication is, that I feel quite sure that female missionary physicians, of the right stamp, would be most important auxiliaries to the missionary work in this part of the world. As society is here constituted, little indeed is the influence a missionary can directly exert on the female portion of the community. You know the habits of female seclusion universally prevalent in this country, and you know how little education there is among this class of the population. True, we have made a hopeful beginning on a small scale, and in the whole country we have several hundreds of Armenian females already connected with our congregations, and of course under our direct influence; but, alas! how little is the access we can gain to the tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands that remain!

But let one of their own sex come among them, well acquainted with the medical art, and with a heart burning with the desire to do good, and I really think she would find herself placed in one of the most enviable positions for usefulness that could be found in this world. The people have a superstitious reverence for those who have a knowledge of diseases and their remedies; and, although we could not honestly wish to foster this feeling, yet while it exists it may be turned to good account, and gradually it would be displaced by more just and reasonable views, while still the skillful medical practitioner would find her services no less in demand.

I may be too sanguine, but it is my present belief that a well-taught female physician in this place would find access to the families of all classes of the people, not excepting the Mohammedans, and she would not find time to attend to one-quarter of the calls that would be made upon her professional services. If, now, in connection with her medical knowledge and experience, she possessed the love of Christ, and the zeal of Christ for the maladies of the soul, how unlimited would be her opportunities for doing good! She would gain access where the missionary never can go, and access, too, to that portion of the community which greatly influences all the rest; for even in Turkey, where woman is so degraded, she still wields a mighty influence in society; for here, as everywhere else, it is true that those who stamp the character of the nursery stamp the character of the nation.

I long to see the experiment made among us; and, with the hope that much time will not elapse before it shall be attempted, I will venture to offer a few hints as to some practical questions connected with the carrying out of such an enterprise. It appears to me plain that, for the comfort and happiness of the individual, as well as for greater usefulness to the cause we all love, she should come out in connection with the American Board of Missions. As no other American society has any operations going on here, she must either be in connection with us, or stand alone. Of the undesirableness and impracticability of the latter course, it is not necessary that I should particularly speak, for your own mind will at once perceive the thing in its true light. Of course, I am not able to say what would be the view of our Committee on the subject, but I do not see why such an individual, properly qualified, might not be regularly appointed as assistant missionary to be attached to this station. She would be useful to the missionary families, and would soon find work enough to do among the people.

The acquisition of the Turkish language would be an indispensable condition for her full success. Indeed, she could do little or nothing without it. If she knew also French or Italian, it would be a decided advantage. The Turkish language would give her access to all classes of the native population.

But I will not enlarge. I will only add that I shall be most happy to furnish any information in my power to Mrs. Hale, or anybody else who takes an interest in this subject; and glad shall I be to hear that this plan is actually going into effect.

I remain, my dear Mrs. Peter,

Very sincerely yours,

H. G. O. DWIGHT.

* Wife of William Peter, Esq., British Consul at Philadelphia. Mrs. Peter is an American lady, well and widely known for her philanthropy and her efforts to promote the real improvement of her own sex. She has lately returned from an extensive tour in the Old World, and reports that in all the missionary stations she visited, British as well as American, the idea of qualifying pious women, wives of missionaries or teachers, to practise as physicians for their own sex and children, was received with approbation.

LATE HOURS.—It is hard to tell, observes an historian, why, all over the world, as the age became more luxurious, the hours became later. Was it the crowd of amusements that pushed on the hours gradually? or were people of fashion better pleased with the secrecy and silence of the night, when the vulgar industrious had gone to rest? In past ages, there were few pastimes but what daylight afforded.

ART-EDUCATION OF CHILDREN.—A recent traveller in England says: "We have found the children of Queen Victoria, at nine in the morning, at the Museum of Practical Art; and, on another occasion, at the same hour, amidst the Elgin marbles—not the only wise hint to the mothers of England to be found in the highest place. Accustom your children to find beauty in goodness, and goodness in beauty."

REWARD OF FEMALE COURAGE.—The "Moniteur" announces that the Cross of the Legion of Honor has just been granted to Madame Abicot de Ragis, who, on the 21st of December last, gave proof of singular courage in contending alone against three malefactors who had invaded her house, in order to burn the archives of the commune of Olson, of which her husband is the mayor. Madame Abicot de Ragis was badly burned, and wounded with a poniard.

DRESS.—Bear it in mind, my young friends, that your dress is a sort of index to your character; that a studied and just economy in dress indicates prudence and forethought, a reference to your future wants, and to the claims of others. How much nobler is this than to be the slave of fashion, an imitator of the follies of those richer than yourselves—one of that frivolous class wittily designated as "clothes-people," because mind, body, and estate are sacrificed to clothes!

Economy is not limited to avoiding extravagance. It will induce you to purchase the most substantial and durable materials for your dress. For example, to buy a straw hat instead of a silk one, a calico instead of a muslin gown, &c. Economy will teach you to mend up an old gown, and make it do, instead of buying a new one.

Nothing will aid you so much in the practice of economy in your dress as expertness with your needle. No American woman, let her speak all the tongue, and play on all the instruments invented, can be said to be educated, if she is not a good needlewoman. With a little pains, you may learn how to make your own gowns. With ingenuity, you can turn and refit them. It would not cost you half the trouble and time it does to learn to embroider muslin well; and, tell me, which contributes the more to a good appearance, a neatly repaired and well-fitted dress, or a worked collar? Which would give you the most favorable impression of the character of the wearer?

TRIBUTE TO MRS. ANNE HILL.—This excellent and accomplished woman was one of the victims in that awful catastrophe, the burning of the Henry Clay. None has been more lamented among the multitude there sacrificed to the reckless spirit of emulation which gives the swiftest steamboat its popularity, and therefore its conductors their power over human destiny. The death of Mrs. Hill is, indeed, a public loss. She was engaged, most successfully, in carrying out the experiment of the "School of Design for Women," established in this city, about four years ago, by Mrs. Sarah Peter. Mrs. Hill had had charge of the school nearly a year, and had gained the entire confidence of both managers and pupils. In a letter of condolence to the afflicted family of the deceased, the latter thus bear testimony to her worth:—

"Never was there a person more completely fitted to gain the affections of those around her than Mrs. Hill. Never a woman better adapted by nature and education for the position in which she was placed. Firm, yet mild and gentle—ready and intelligent—acute and penetrating—with an extraordinary faculty of adaptation, yet without the constitutional impatience so frequently associated with these qualities; animated and spirited, without being vehement and passionate, she was capable of exercising a remarkable degree of self-control, either natural or acquired. She appeared to possess, by intuition, that insight into character which, with some minds, is the result of long-continued reflection, attained only by habits of inference and analogy.

"The happy faculty, also, of keeping in shadow whatever was calculated to dampen and sadden the feelings of her pupils was most particularly a virtue of our much lamented teacher."

The managers of the Franklin Institute, of Pennsylvania, who were also patrons and advisers of the lady managers of the "School of Design," thus record their respect for her memory:—

"The Committee on the 'School of Design for Women' have the painful duty of announcing to the Institute the death of Mrs. Anne Hill, the Principal of said school. She left the city, a few weeks ago, to enjoy a short vacation from the labors of the school, and was one of the passengers on board of the steamboat Henry Clay, at the time such a lamentable destruction of life attended the configuration of that vessel. Mrs. Hill was one of those drowned in an attempt to escape from the boat, and there seems reason to believe that she fell a sacrifice to her efforts to save a drowning child. She had endeared herself to the committee, to the pupils in the school, and to all its contributors and patrons, by the uniform devotion and energy she manifested in the welfare and success of the school, by her complete adaptations, personal, moral, and professional, for its management, and by those ready and practical talents which so remarkably contributed to its usefulness, and to the enjoyment of the public confidence.

"By this sudden and afflicting dispensation of Providence, the school has been bereaved of a head which it will be difficult to replace; her children and family have lost a kind, faithful, and religious mother and relative, and the community has been deprived of one whose career of usefulness in a new philanthropic effort was full of the promise of rich and abundant good.

"Sincerely condoling with all those who have thus lost one endeared to them by the possession of such gifts, the committee offer the following resolutions:—

"Resolved, That the sympathy and condolence of the Institute be, and the same are hereby tendered to the family of Mrs. Anne Hill, to her late pupils, and to her friends, in the great and irreparable bereavement which they have suffered by her death.

"Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolutions be transmitted to the family of Mrs. Hill by the President of the Institute, and that the same be entered at large upon the minutes, as a humble tribute of our estimation of her usefulness.

S. V. MERRICK, President."

CHRISTMAS!—and a merry one, will, we hope, be enjoyed by our readers. This holiday is so near neighbor of New Year, that we anticipate the last while thinking of the first. The farewell we bid our readers and friends at the close of this number seems united with the welcome we shall give them to our new volume of January, 1853.

VOLUME XLV.—This number closes the forty-fifth volume of the "Lady's Book." If age proves merit in a literary magazine, ours may well claim the crown. No other periodical of the kind in our land has been so long and well sustained. We ask a continuance of this liberal support: we are resolved to merit the patronage of all who wish to sustain the credit of American talent, and improve the character of American literature.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "The East," "On the Common Fallacy that Youth is a Blessing," "Presentiment," "Twas the Dawning of Day," "The Message to the Dead," "Sonnet," "The Dream-land of Hope," "Not at Home," "The Zephyr's Message," "Hill Allah!" "Scene at the Cascade Bridge," and "Life in Earnest."

The following are declined; some because we have no room, and others because not adapted to our pages: "Memory," "The Lone Heart's Complaint," "A Dirge," "Lake Ontario," "I'll think of Thee, Amanda," "The Past," "Letter to my Father," "The Three Boons," "Love and Poetry," "When Echo answers Echo," "To the Lark," "The Weary World," "A Last Look," "Gossips," "The Deal," "A Truce to my Aspirings," "Wonders," "She is Gone," and "A Winter Song."

A number of articles on hand we have not had time to examine. The writers are not forgotten; and we thank our many friends for their constant favors.

Lady Subscribers.—Smoking-cap in our next number.

"Nina," Mexico, N. Y.—What was the title of the article? Please be explicit.

"W. H. W." New York.—Must have a little patience with us. There are MSS. that we have had on hand a long time, that must take precedence. The corrections will be made.

Literary Notices.

From J. S. REDFIELD, Clinton Hall, New York, through W. B. ZIEBER, Philadelphia:—

PHILOSOPHERS AND ACTRESSES. From the French of Arsene Housaye. Two volumes. A knowledge of the subjects of these volumes—French philosophers and French actresses—would be, to most minds, satisfactory evidence with regard to their worthless character. Yet, although the author has not kept very closely to his subjects, we much doubt whether the wit and wisdom which do at times appear in his pages, would repay any one for the danger incurred in gathering them from the mass of flippancy, false sentiment, useless philosophy, licentious scandal, and masked infidelity from which they spring, like flowers on the dizzy verge of a precipice. Some knowledge is undoubtedly useful and necessary, but the knowledge of evil is the curse of man; and the less we know of the wrong side of human nature, the more peaceful, pure, and beneficent will be the tenor of our lives. Not so, thinks M. Housaye. And there is, besides, every evidence that he belongs to that class of epicureans who, departing from the true, beautiful, and practicable precepts of their Master—"virtue is pleasure"—have inscribed on the altar of their passions the seductive, though fallacious sentiment, that pleasure is virtue. It is not necessary, nay, it is full of misery to mankind, that there should be converts to this latter doctrine. And, therefore, M. Housaye being free to write books for such a purpose, and others being free to translate and to publish them, we, too, claim the privilege of saying, in regard to them, that they are entirely unfit for the perusal, if not of gentlemen, certainly of the truly modest and amiable ladies of our country.

ANCIENT EGYPT UNDER THE PHARAOHS. By John Kenrick, A. M. This is a work of deep research into the mysteries of antiquity, and is, consequently, full of interest to the student of history. It describes, to use the words of the author, according to the present state of our knowledge, the land and the people of Egypt, their arts and sciences, their civil institutions, and their religious faith and usages; and relates their history from the earliest records of the monarchy to its final absorption in the empire of Alexander.

COMPARATIVE PHYSIOGNOMY; or, Resemblances between Men and Animals. By James W. Redfield, M. D. This is an amusing book, having no less than three hundred and fifty pictures of men and beasts, between whom the author professes to have discovered a resemblance. How far he will be able to carry his readers with him in his imaginary discoveries, and in his descriptions and comparisons, we must leave to the readers themselves.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF FITZ GREENE HALLECK. We have, in a preceding number of the "Lady's Book," noticed the publication, by Redfield, of New York, of a new and beautiful edition of the poetical works of Mr. Halleck, who is universally known to the literary world as one of the best of our American poets. As an author, Mr. H. was foremost among his contemporaries in the establishment of an unequivocal literary reputation for his country, and in claiming for her writers an undisputed equality with European writers of the present age. Possessing the rarest qualifications of genius, directed by a sound and polished education, an exuberant fancy, always under the control of a pure moral sentiment, no man has done more by his writings to elevate and adorn the literature of his country than Mr. Halleck. And, for presenting this new edition of his works to the public, at a time when the strife seems to be who shall print and who shall read the greatest number of true works, the publisher deserves the thanks of every true-hearted American reader. The volume is for sale by W. B. Zieber, Third below Chestnut Street.

From M. W. DODD, New York, through J. W. MOORE, Philadelphia:—

STORIES OF ANCIENT ROME. By F. W. Ricord. With illustrations. There is scarcely any history so interesting to youthful readers as that of ancient Rome, especially that portion of it dating from the exposure of the "wolf-suckled twins," to the overthrow of the Tarquins. There is an air of fabulous enchantment thrown round this period of Roman history, which, however much matter-of-fact men may desire it to be removed, will never be wholly dissipated, and never can cease to gratify the fancy both of the young and the old. The volume before us is "intended as the first of a connected series devoted to the most important events of Roman history," and is a complete account, arranged under appropriate heads, of the period we have above alluded to. The author's design has been to adapt his "stories" to the capacities of the young, and, at the same time, to render them agreeable and instructive to the general reader. In this, by his clear, simple, and yet attractive style, he has been very successful. We have only one objection to make, after a cursory examination, which is, that Mr. Ricord has descended occasionally to the rhetorical artifices of thinking for his heroes. This, it is true, is a common thing with modern historians; but, still, there is nothing, in our opinion, more deserving of reprehension. A cultivated imagination is not satisfied with it, a correct judgment condemns it, and it is utterly opposed to truth. It is an error, however, into which Mr. Ricord has rarely fallen, and into which he has perhaps been drawn by the imagined orations so numerous in the illustrious authors from whom his materials are derived.

FROM CHARLES SCRIBNER, New York, through LINDSAY & BLAKISTON, Philadelphia:—

ARCHIBALD CAMERON; OR, HEART-TRIALS. This is the life-history of a very pious and amiable young man, in the form of a novel, "founded upon fact." If sound morality, fine sentiments, and not a few striking and interesting descriptions and incidents, together with a generally clear, and oftentimes poetical form of expression, are calculated to attract readers, we can entertain no doubt of the rapid and extensive sale of this publication. There are some points of practical theology discussed in its pages, upon anything but the graphic merits of which we, of course, can speak with but little certainty. Whether ministers do resort to the artifices mentioned, in order to gain popularity and rich congregations, it is not our province to decide; but certainly there appears to be a strong verisimilitude to nature, together with a great deal of quiet humor and gentle seriousness in our author's description of the practices which he insinuates many young clergymen are forced to adopt, in order to secure and retain the good-will of their congregations.

THE LIVES OF WINFIELD SCOTT AND ANDREW JACKSON. By J. T. Headley, author of "Napoleon and his Marshals," "Washington and his Generals," etc. etc. The author informs us that this volume "is designed to be the commencement of a series of biographical sketches of distinguished men of the present generation." It is written in Mr. Headley's usually graphic and attractive style. The book is embellished with likenesses of the two heroes, of whose patriotic services it is the record.

ESSAYS ON THE PROGRESS OF NATIONS, in Civilization, Productive Industry, Manufactures, Commerce, Banking, Internal Improvements, Emigration, and Population. By Ezra C. Seaman. This is a volume of upwards of six hundred pages. It is a compilation of essays written by the author on the subjects embraced in the title, in the years 1845, 1847, and 1848. To these a large amount of new matter has been added, and the whole "condensed, corrected, and rearranged." With the author's speculations on the progress of nations in religion, politics, and civilization, we do not propose to meddle. In relation to these questions, including the author's general view of governments, ancient and modern, we have, however, read very different relations, drawn from quite as reliable authorities as those referred to in this work. The statistics of commerce, manufactures, population, etc. etc., form a very interesting feature in the compilation, and will be acceptable to those who desire to be acquainted with matters of loss and gain in the science of barter and the philosophy of trade.

OUTLINES OF MORAL SCIENCE. By Archibald Alexander, D. D., late Professor in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J. At a time when the press is teeming with the productions of a class of authors who seem to be guided by no moral or benevolent principles whatever, it is pleasant to come in contact with a volume like this, so complete in all its arrangements, so simple, and yet so comprehensive in its arguments, so sound and irrefutable in its logic, and, above all, so full of the benignant spirit, and of the true teachings of Christianity. It is not long since we laid down a work, in which its author seemed to labor hard to prove that the Christian doctrine of obedience had been the cause of nearly all the miseries of mankind, and of all the darkness which is supposed to have enveloped the world, wholly or partially, up to the period, or thereabouts, of the first French Revolution. But here is a moral philosopher who teaches sublimer doctrines, here is an historian whose deductions from the records of civilization are far more consoling to the heart of the truly enlightened progressionist. No intelligent, right-minded reader, whether he has or has not been influenced by the treacherous sophisms of Gibbon and Hume, or by the slighter, but unpardonable errors of Paley and other authors, will rise from the perusal of this volume without feeling himself to be a wiser, if not a better man. No free-thinker, no atheist, in whose bosom there still lingers a spark of feeling allied even to human gratitude—we will not say to divine love—however faint it may be, will fail to be touched by the conclusive reasoning, and the persuasive eloquence through which the author prepares the mind and the heart for the reception of the paramount truth of God's existence, and of the great and consequent duty of "obedience to his will," incumbent upon all his creatures.

OUR FIRST MOTHER. The author of this work, as we believe, has aimed to impart Scriptural instruction upon a number of select topics naturally suggested by the Mosaic history. The "character and the matter, the style and execution of the work" have been cordially approved of by several theological professors, who speak confidently of the author's extensive Biblical research, and who state that, in religious doctrine, he is always orthodox.

LITTLE SILVERSTRING; or, Tales and Poems for the Young. By Wm. Olana Bourne. This is a beautiful volume, full of instruction and entertainment for the young. It contains fifty stories, sketches, and poems, all of which are admirably composed, and designed not merely to amuse, but to instruct and adorn the minds of youthful readers.

FROM HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through LINDSAY & BLAKISTON, Philadelphia:—

THE PERSONAL ADVENTURES OF "OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT" IN ITALY. Showing how an Active Campaigner can find Good Quarters when Other Men lie in the Fields; Good Dinners when Many are Half Starved; and Good Wine, though the King's Staff be reduced to Half Rations. By Michael Burke Honan. We have not perused this book; but learn, from the first sentence in the preface, that it is original, and not a reprint of the author's correspondence from Italy to the "London Times." Near the close of the work, the author says of himself: "I am a good Roman Catholic—not good in a religious or moral sense, I have the humility to say, but a faithful son of the old church, who never will desert its standard." It would seem, from this, that his church has some other standards, and some other evidences of faithfulness besides those of religion and morality. But Mr. Honan is an impulsive Irishman, and therefore we will not visit his church with what appears to be a natural mistake, or a native bias.

THE INSTITUTES OF ALGEBRA. Being the first of a Course of Mathematics. Designed for the Use of Schools, Academies, and Colleges. By Gerardus Beekman Docharty, LL. D., Professor of Mathematics in the New York Free Academy. The author of this work, who has been twenty-five years a teacher of mathematics, presents it to the public under the belief that it will materially lighten the labor of the instructor, and facilitate the progress of the pupil.

PARISIAN SIGHTS AND FRENCH PRINCIPLES, SEEN THROUGH AMERICAN SPECTACLES. The majority of "Parisian Sights" are, no doubt, very interesting; and, though they have been frequently displayed, may still claim a respectable share of admiration, especially when delineated in so handsome a manner as they are in the volume before us. Some of them, however, and a large portion of what are called "French principles," might so far as our plain republican morality is concerned, be left to the examination of French opticians. Holding this opinion, we cannot be expected to approve very cordially of a book which, though generally unexceptionable, contains the result of a rather too microscope observation of the immoral sights and principles of Paris and the Parisians. The author, we admit, is profuse in condemnation of the licentiousness of French usages; yet even he, a respectable American father, has not handled pitch and escaped undefiled, and has frequently to blush for some of his equivocal representations of sights and principles.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York, through C. G. HENDERSON & Co. (late Geo. S. Appleton), Philadelphia:—

SUMMER-TIME IN THE COUNTRY. By the Rev. R. A. Willmott, author of "Jeremy Taylor: a Biography." This is the summer journal of an observant and well-read rural clergyman, devoted rather to literature than to natural history, and more intent on recording the thoughts and emotions excited by a poetic and philosophic contemplation of nature, than on making scientific notes with regard to the movements and doings of bugs, beetles, and caterpillars. Stored, as it is, with profound reflections, judicious criticisms, and pleasing researches, which are beautifully illustrated by a liberal and happy use of quotations, this little volume can scarcely fail to meet the taste of the most refined and fastidious reader.

STORIES FROM "BLACKWOOD." Of these, we need only say that they are carefully selected from among those tales which, by their excellence and finished brevity, have been a remarkable feature in the remarkable pages of "Old Ebony." Many of them have long enjoyed a high and deserved popularity, which, in their present convenient form, will, no doubt, be considerably enhanced.

MEN'S WIVES. By W. M. Thackeray. This volume comprises a series of amusing and attractive papers originally published in "Frazer's Magazine" for 1843, and is written in its author's usual vein of mingled pleasantry and pathos, sentiment and satire.

The publications above noticed, we would here remark, form a part of Appleton's well-selected and neatly printed, cheap, and "Popular Library of the Best Authors."

REUBEN MEDLICOTT; OR, THE COMING MAN. By M. W. Savage, Esq., author of the "Bachelor of the Albany," "My Uncle, the Curate," etc. etc. One volume. We have not for some time met with a more acceptable novel than the one at present under notice. We took it up for the purpose of giving it a mere superficial examination; but soon became so interested in its pleasing descriptions, vivid delineations of character, and knowing observations with regard to human life, that we were unable to return it to our table until we had perused its entire contents. Our reading was, of course, hasty; and, consequently, we cannot well determine as to the justness of the author's conclusions respecting certain questions of reform, that still agitate, in a greater or less degree, the minds of many honest-intentioned persons; but our own intercourse with the world has thrown us into contact with not a few Reuben Medlicotts, who, to use his own words, form "signal examples of how little is to be done, in this busy world, by much knowledge, much talent, much ambition, nay, even by much activity, without singleness of aim and steadiness of purpose." Such is the moral of the story, which, with all its scenes of humor and gaiety, is a melancholy one. Yet, if the reader shall arise from its perusal a sadder man, he will also, for the moment, at least, be a wiser and a better.

EVENINGS AT DONALDSON MANOR; or, the Christmas Guest. By Maria J. McIntosh, author of "Two Lives," "Charms and Countercharms," etc. etc. A new revised edition. Many of our readers are perhaps familiar with this volume, the first edition of which was republished in England with great success, and met with the highest commendation. To those, however, who are not, we would remark that it is a series of tales, poetical translations, etc., gracefully combined with the scenes and incidents forming the story to which its title is due; the whole written in a pleasing and elegant manner, uniting sparkling criticisms with delicate humor, and delightful home-pictures with lively descriptions of exterior nature, and pervaded by a cheerful tone of simple and unstrained morality.

LIVES OF WELLINGTON AND PEARL. From the "London Times." This is a neat volume, uniform with "Appleton's Popular Library of the Best Authors."

From H. LONG & BROTHER, New York:—

NORTHWOOD; OR, LIFE NORTH AND SOUTH. Showing the true Character of Both. By Mrs. Sarah Josepha Hale. This work has not been got up for the occasion, and to minister to the prevailing excitement on a delicate question of State and National policy. It was first published in Boston, twenty-five years ago, and was the first introduction of the authoress to the American public, and at once established her reputation as a writer of fiction, chastened and elevated by the purest moral and religious sentiments. We have never yet, and we have no idea now of mingling in any of the political controversies that agitate the public mind; but it is only an act of justice rendered to the authoress to say, that there is no thought or sentiment expressed in the pages of "Northwood" that will not bear the strictest test of literary and moral criticism, as well as of the purest love of country. It is conservative throughout, calm and considerate in its tone and reflections, and altogether such a work as might be expected to emanate from the pen of a Christian woman.

From T. B. PETERSON, Philadelphia:—

THE CABIN AND THE PARLOR; OR, SLAVES AND MASTERS. By J. Thornton Randolph. This book was very generally and favorably noticed by the press before it made its appearance, and, from all we have heard and seen of its contents since its publication, we think the criticisms of some of its first chapters were just. Our copy, unfortunately, was not received until it was too late to give the work more than a cursory examination, even had the leaves been cut or separated, as should always be the case when a patient investigation and a "good notice" are expected. We have, nevertheless, become sufficiently familiar with the author's vigorous style and general views, to enable us to say that he has written a most thrilling narrative, which will at once deeply interest the feelings, and forcibly appeal to the good sense and judgment of his readers.

From BUNCE & BROTHER, New York:—

JACK RUNNYMEDE; or, the Man of Many Thanks. By Douglas Jerrold. This is the title of an amusing little pamphlet volume, over which we have enjoyed not a few hearty laughs, not unmingled, however, of the moral it seems slyly to inculcate—that enthusiastic views of social and political perfection are often converted, by bitter experience, or by a change of fortune and circumstances, into opinions the very opposite of those previously entertained.

THE GIRARD COLLEGE, AND ITS FOUNDER: containing the Biography of Mr. Girard, the History of the Institution, its Organization and Plan of Discipline, with the Course of Education, Forms of Admission of Pupils, Description of the Buildings, etc. etc., and the Will of Mr. Girard. By Henry W. Arey, Secretary of Girard College. The author has favored us with a copy of the above neat little volume. It contains a great deal of information in regard to the Girard College, which will interest our citizens generally.

LIBRARY OF USEFUL KNOWLEDGE. It is now ten years since we observed, of "The American Pocket Library," that "we knew no one better calculated than its editor, Thomas C. Clarke, for making so useful a book. It is a perfect vade mecum." Since then, many thousand copies have been sold; and, having been long since out of print, it has now been nearly doubled in size, and reissued by Mr. Clarke, with large additions, making it, of course, still more valuable than when, some years since, it was pronounced the best work of its kind in the country. As it is issued after the United States Census, which, with the Constitution of the United States, is embodied in its pages, we hope to have the satisfaction of welcoming its appearance at the close of the next ten years.

"UNCLE TOM'S CABIN" CONTRASTED WITH BUCKINGHAM HALL, THE PLANTER'S HOME; OR, A FAIR VIEW OF BOTH SIDES OF THE SLAVERY QUESTION. By Robert Criswell, Esq., author of "Letters from the South and West." Published by D. Fanshaw, New York. We have been favored by the author with a copy of this work. In presenting it to the public, he says he has but one motive in view, "which is to contribute his mite in endeavoring to allay the great agitation on the slavery question, between the North and South, which threatens to dissolve our glorious Union."

From H. C. PACK & THOMAS BLISS, N. E. corner of Third and Arch Streets, Philadelphia:—

THE ODD FELLOW'S MANUAL. Illustrating the history, principles, and government of the order, and the instructions and duties of every degree, station, and office in Odd Fellowship; with directions for laying corner-stones, dedicating cemeteries, chapels, halls, and other public edifices; marshalling funeral and other processions; forms for petitions, appeals, etc. Also odes, with music, for various occasions. Embellished with numerous engravings of the emblems, etc. By the Rev. Aaron B. Grosh. This is a handsomely printed volume.

MUSIC.

From T. C. Andrews, 66 Spring Garden Street, Philadelphia: "The New Russian Masourka Quadrilles." Composed and arranged for the piano forte, and dedicated to Mr. John Hewston, Jr., by Orlando F. Slack. The figures composed and adapted by Charles Durang, and danced at the assemblies of Mr. and Miss Durang.

From the same publisher, and for sale by Lee & Walker, 188 Chestnut Street, and S. Winner, 267 Callowhill Street, Philadelphia: "The Boarding-School Polkas." Arranged and composed by Thomas A. Becket. Distinguished by the names of Josephine, Adelaide, Clara, Rosabelle, and Georgiana.

NOVELS, SERIALS, PAMPHLETS, &c.

From E. S. Jones & Co., S. W. corner of Fourth and Race Streets, Philadelphia: Nos. 14 and 15 of the "Model Architect," containing original designs for colleges, villas, suburban residences, etc., accompanied by explanations, specifications, and elaborate details, etc. etc. By Samuel Sloan, Architect. A very beautiful and very serviceable work.

From Dewitt & Davenport, New York: "Heads and Hearts; or, my Brother, the Colonel." A novel, illustrative of the dangerous consequences of yielding to the impulses of the feelings, rather than listening to the dictates of prudence. By the author of "Cousin Cecily," etc.

From Robert E. Peterson & Co., N. W. corner of Fifth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia: "The National Portrait

Gallery of Distinguished Americans, with Biographical Sketches, containing upwards of one hundred and twenty Engraved Portraits of the most Eminent Men who have occupied a place in the History of the United States." We have before noticed this work, copies of which should be preserved in every American's library, as the memories of the heroes and sages, whose portraits adorn it, should retain a place in the grateful and affectionate regard of every American heart. The work has now reached the eleventh number. Price 25 cents each.

From Harper & Brothers, New York, through Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia: "Pictorial Field Book of the Revolution." No. 28. Price 25 cents.

From George P. Putnam & Co., New York: "Whims and Oddities." By Thomas Hood. No. 17 of "Putnam's Semi-Monthly Library for Travellers and the Fireside." Humorous series, with numerous wood-cuts.—"The Eagle Pass; or, Life on the Border." By Cora Montgomery. No. 18 of the above work, copyright edition.

From Gould & Lincoln, Boston, through W. B. Zieber, Philadelphia: "Chambers's Pocket Miscellany." Vol. 6. Price 20 cents.

From T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia: "The Coquette." A Novel. By the author of "Miserimus." We have had no time to examine this book: we observe, however, that the English critics speak very highly of the author's wit and satire.

From Lippincott, Grambo, & Co., Philadelphia: "The Monastery." This is the fifth volume of the enterprising publishers' beautiful edition of the Waverley Novels, by Sir Walter Scott, printed from the latest English edition, embracing the author's latest corrections, prefaces, and notes.

Receipts, &c.

THE frequent use of asparagus is strongly recommended in affections of the chest and lungs; in fact, asparagus is one of the most wholesome, as well as agreeable vegetables we possess.

A FEW drops of creosote on brown paper, put in the holes of rats, will drive them away. Nux vomica and oatmeal is a sure poison.

BURNS AND SCALDS.—In any case of burn or scald, however extensive, all the acute suffering of the patient may be at once and permanently relieved, and that in a moment of time, by sprinkling over the injured surface a thick layer of wheat flour, by the hand, or, what is better, by a dredging-box. Every vestige of pain produced by such injuries is instantly removed, and the sufferer not only escapes the shock to the nervous system accompanying such torture, but will generally fall into a quiet sleep the moment the atmospheric temperature is thus excluded from the wound. Multitudes are annually perishing by scalds in steamboats, and from burns by camphine, spirit-gas, and otherwise, nearly all of whom might be preserved from a fatal result, if this simple practice were adopted immediately after such accidents.

A MINIAURE round of beef may be made of a rib of beef. Take out the bone, and wrap the meat round like a fillet of veal, securing it with two or three wooden skewers; place in strong pickle for four or five days; and then put it in hot water, and let it simmer the usual time.

A GOOD GARGLE, in inflammatory sore-throats, may be made by mixing a little nitre in barley-water.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

CHRISTMAS.—The return of the festive season of Christmas, which has always been a time of mutual congratulations among Christians, admonishes us not only of the swift revolutions of time, but of the particular and pleasant duty incumbent on us of presenting our grateful compliments to those friends with whom we have peacefully journeyed through the varied scenes of the twelve months now drawing to a close. Among them, we might include many with whom we have travelled for the last twelve years; but we are content to be restricted to the closing twelve months, for, in that period, we have still had the pleasure of recognizing a numerous body of old and faithful friends, who have been with us from the first advent of our successful experiment.

But our object now is not to make the least distinction between old and new friends. Many of our new acquaintances would have been with us before, no doubt, had they not been somewhat behind the times, and many of our old friends would long since have left us, in the usual course of time, had they not been providentially spared for the benefit of those who were to come after them.

We feel prepared, therefore, peacefully, joyfully, and gratefully, to close the year with all our excellent friends, both old and new, begging them to accept of our hearty good wishes for their peace, health, happiness, and prosperity; assuring them, at the same time, of our appreciation of their past favors, and of our determination to deserve their future consideration and confidence.

What more can we say in reference to the return of Christmas? If the above paragraphs do not convey all that it would be essential to embrace in the longest kind of an editorial, we might proceed to string it out without an historical account of the usages, religious and festive, serious and frolicsome, of the different ages of Christianity. But what would it all avail, if we neglected the important fact that we are about to celebrate the coming of a heavenly Prince, whose great mission was to establish "peace and good-will among men?"

Let us, then, so order our minds, and so prepare our dispositions, by mutual resolutions of faith, hope, and charity, that we may be prepared peacefully to commune one with another, and to celebrate, with grateful hearts, the return of a festival so intimately connected with our common Christianity, as the festival of Christmas.

GODEY FOR DECEMBER.—Five full-page plates again. Two of them colored. "The Blind Piper," a beautiful mezzotint; "The Morning Star," colored; "Ready to Start," a tableau of the fashions; "Snow-Balling," our title-page, printed in colors; and a "Model Cottage."

In our January number, we will commence the publication of Mrs. C. Lee Hentz's best nouvelle. It will probably run through four or five numbers. The "Hermit of Rockrest" will create a sensation.

HAVE we no writers of humorous poetry among our numerous correspondents? We have a large supply of the serious article, and would like a little of the former to mix with it. We will send the "Lady's Book" as a compensation for a few accepted pieces.

VOL. XLV.—50

We request our subscribers to read the following, and be governed accordingly. We quote it from "Memoirs and Recollections of Editorial Life," by Jos. T. Buckingham:—

"The income of a newspaper, though nominally large and apparently equal to all reasonable expenditure, as it appears on the ledger, and in the imagination of the proprietor, is yet but a feeble and delusive reliance in times when business is in a state of dullness and depression. The amount of debts from the subscribers may be large, but is made up of small sums, and scattered over an immense territory. From 1830 to 1848, I doubt whether there was a day when the aggregate debts due to the Courier was less than ten thousand dollars—sometimes it far exceeded that amount—in sums ranging from fifty cents to fifty dollars. The customers of a newspaper think but little of this. It seldom occurs to them that the printer is borrowing money—perhaps at an extravagant interest—to enable him to carry on the publication, while they are neglecting his demands and paying nothing for the indulgence. Such was my unfortunate position."

We have sent bills to our owing subscribers in this number, and we earnestly entreat their attention to them.

We call attention to our advertisement for 1858. We make no more promises there than we mean to perform. Our course has been so well approved of, that we make no alterations for the future.

THE following is worth copying. We say nothing about the compliment; but its humor pleases us. It is from the "Hickman Argus":—

"Godey is at hand, and our 'better half' who never fails to get a peep at it first, authorizes us to say that it is increasing in merit with each succeeding number. If every man's wife thought as highly of the 'Lady's Book' as ours does, Godey could not half supply the demand. The moment the magazine comes to hand—she keeps the devil bribed to inform her—she retires with it, nor suspends reading until she reaches the significant word, 'Fini,' let the baby cry never so much."

A GENTLEMAN from Suffolk, Va., incloses us $3, and says: "My business engagements causing me to neglect my duty in paying up earlier, my lady, who, of course, takes a great interest in what is prepared to benefit her sex, has played the part of the collector for you, and dunned me for the $3 till I am forced to recollect it, and 'settle up.' Probably a hint to the ladies, drawn from my experience, may save the expense of employing collectors for the future, for they 'never tire.' Thank you, Mrs. J."

INNOCENT PLEASURE.—We have read many descriptions and definitions of what the poets and novelists have called innocent pleasures. But the most singular and simple that ever came under our view was the remark of Kossuth, when introduced to a farmer at Albany. "I love farming," he said. "I used to go out on my little farm in Hungary, and watch the trees grow which I planted with my own hands; and, when a peach came on one of them, I took my wife out twenty times a day to see how it grew. It was such innocent pleasure."

MRS. HALE'S NEW BOOK OF COOKERY. Published by H. Long & Brother, New York.—Since the publication of this work, over six thousand copies have been disposed of by the publishers. Our orders from subscribers to the "Lady's Book" have been for three hundred copies. We expect that every lady subscriber to the "Book" will send for a copy, and we shall not be satisfied until they are all supplied. The question has been asked, How have we been able heretofore to get on without this work? It must supersede all other cookery books, as it contains many more receipts, and is more complete in every way.

We annex a notice from the "Commercial Advertiser," one of the oldest and best papers in New York:—

"THE LADIES' NEW BOOK OF COOKERY. By Sarah J. Hale. New York, H. Long & Brother.—This is the latest, and probably the best popular treatise on the culinary science. It is printed in one handsome volume of 474 pages, and illustrated by numerous wood-cuts, explanatory of the art of carving, and the proper methods of dishing either joints or entrées. The preface thus enumerates some of the claims which the book has to preference over previous publications of a similar character:—

"In this work, the true relations of food to health are set forth, and the importance of good cookery to the latter clearly explained. Preparations of food for the sick have been carefully attended to, and many new and excellent receipts introduced. Cookery for children is an entirely new feature in a work of this kind, and of much importance. A greater variety of receipts for preparing fish, vegetables, and soups is given here than can be found in any other book of the kind; these preparations, having reference to the large and increasing class of persons in our country who abstain from fresh meats during Lent, will be found excellent and useful; also to families during the hot season. As our republic is made up from the people of all lands, so we have gathered the best receipts from the domestic economy of the different nations of the Old World; emigrants from each country will, in this 'New Book of Cookery,' find the method of preparing their favorite dishes. The prominent features are, however, American."

"Distrusting our own ability to pronounce upon the merits of Mrs. Hale's receipts, we handed the volume to a culinary connoisseur, whose opinion on such matters is, with us, decisive; and who praises it very highly, saying that no lady, having charge of a household, should neglect to possess a copy of such a useful work."

We still continue to fill orders: strong paper covers at $1, and bound $1 25. In both cases, we will pay the postage.

OUR BOOK OF PLATES.—We can still furnish our thirty splendid engravings for fifty cents.

The following are the latest notices of "Arthur's Home Gazette" that we have seen. We see that Messrs. Arthur & Co. have started a new magazine. Advertisements of both works will be found on our cover.

The "Flushing (N. Y.) Journal" says: "Arthur's Home Gazette, published at Philadelphia, is one of the best, if not the very best family newspaper published in the United States. There is a healthy moral tone in its columns, that makes it a favorite with those families who have children whose tastes and principles are to be formed, and who are wisely alive to the character of the reading that they admit into the family circle."

The "American," at Waterbury, Conn., says: "This admirable literary paper entered upon its third year on the 4th of September. Of all our exchanges, we know of no one—taken as a whole—that is better calculated to shed a kind influence over the family circle, exempt, as it is, from the drawbacks of all dangerous and impure sentiments."

The "Carson League," Syracuse, N. Y., says: "Too much cannot be said in praise of this weekly. It combines the useful and entertaining in the highest degree. It is remarkable for its purity, as well as its genius and talent. Mr. Arthur fully redeems his pledge, by making his paper what a home paper should be—chaste, dignified, and entirely free from everything that can vitiate, or in the least deprave the mind."

HART, WARR, & Co. have a most splendid display of furniture at their repository, No. 280 Chestnut Street. We would call particular attention to their cottage furniture, which is now in general use. Their tables and stands, finished in papier maché, are worthy the reputation of American artists.

SONTAG.—We welcome this gifted artiste to our country. She stands high as a vocalist and as a lady. Her concerts at the Musical Fund Hall have been crowded every night. She is a beautiful woman, and is generally admired for her personal and artistic worth. The Germania Society added her with their powerful orchestra. Our old favorite, Biddell, the youthful Paul Julien, and the gifted Jaell, have also greatly added in drawing the crowds that have met to greet this queen of song.

We copy the following notice from the "Christian Intelligencer":—

"The European reputation of Henrietta Sontag having long since preceded her, it was not to be wondered at that much of both curiosity and interest was manifested to see and hear a vocalist as much renowned for her domestic virtues as her talent. In the world of amusement, we are too apt to think only of the enjoyment of the moment, and to lavish our praises on the person who ministers to it, irrespective of all consideration of the artist's character and position in life, and of their fulfilment of those duties, moral and social, incumbent on us all, and which all may, and can fulfil, even while pursuing a profession surrounded with temptations. How much greater, then, is our satisfaction and enjoyment, when we behold a lady like Madame Sontag, whose home virtues have been proverbial in the mouths of the wise and good!"

MADAME ALBONI.—Madame Alboni gave a series of concerts in Philadelphia, in the Musical Fund Hall. The audiences were large, brilliant, and fashionable, and the great contralto was received with every mark of appreciation and delight. The favorable impression made by her début in this city was fully strengthened and confirmed. She is an artist of the very highest order—is at once gifted, polished, experienced, and cultivated. In person, she is quite large, but not ungraceful. She has a fine eye, beautiful teeth, and a captivating smile. Her manner, indeed, is wonderfully easy and self-possessed. She appears perfectly at home in all she undertakes, and apparently sings without the least effort. There is no distortion of the face or straining of the muscles; but the flow of her rich and melodious voice may be compared to the gushing of a crystal spring. Every note is clear and distinct, and the most difficult shakes and cadences are given with freedom, precision, and beauty. Many of her tones seemed to penetrate to the very hearts of her listeners, and to rouse, thrill, and delight. The orchestra was full and effective, and the overtures were given in the most creditable manner. The entertainments, from first to last, were every way superior, and Alboni may be regarded as having fully established herself in the good opinions of the musical amateurs of Philadelphia.

ADALINE PATTI.—We have recently had a little wonder by this name singing here. She executes the most difficult pieces of vocalism in a manner truly astonishing. All the most celebrated of Jenny Lind's, Sontag's, and Alboni's songs come as trippingly from her as from the more elder artists. We commend her to our brethren of the press in the different cities she may visit.

WELCH'S PORTRAIT OF WASHINGTON.—A magnificent production; one worthy of this great artist. It will be a fortune for our friend Welch, and we know of no person to whom we more heartily wish it. The price is five dollars, and it is very low for such a publication. Address Geo. W. Childs & Co., N. W. corner of Fifth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia.

THE PHILADELPHIA ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—This institution opened on the first of October last, at No. 171 Chestnut Street, O. C. B. Carter, Principal, assisted by Professor Whitcomb, the pupil of Lowell Mason and George James Webb, and by Mademoiselle Helene Schaaff, a young lady from Germany, of high qualifications as a pianist and an experienced teacher, and Professor Andrea Alfist, from Italy. The object of this institution is to impart a thorough knowledge of the elementary principles of music, as the only key to a practical acquaintance with music as an art.

HORTICULTURAL PARTY.—It is rather an unusual season to write about horticulture; but, as our last number was in the press when the party took place, we could not do it then, and we should be wanting in good taste if we did not make any mention of the matter. The party was given by Dr. Wm. D. Brincklé, at his mansion in Girard Row, and the display of fruits of all kinds was the finest we ever saw. Dr. B., notwithstanding the duties of his arduous profession, devotes a portion of his time to horticultural pursuits, and we know of no gentleman more ardent in the cause, or one more capable.

PARKINSON'S BUILDING, CHESTNUT STREET, ABOVE TENTH.—This ornament to our city, and praiseworthy place, was opened to our citizens last month. It is intended as an ice-cream saloon, summer garden, confectionery, fruit store, and restaurant, and is likely to become one of the most popular and fashionable resorts in our city. There are four saloons in all, two of which are 22 by 50 feet, and all furnished in the most magnificent style. The paper, the painting, and the carpets are elegant, tasteful, and in admirable keeping. The enterprise is one of the most laudable character, and adds a new and attractive feature to Chestnut Street. The garden is embellished with a fountain, and many other appropriate ornaments. It is far superior to any of the celebrated establishments in New York. It must be popular; and already we hear that the worthy proprietor is reaping a rich harvest.

THE ASSEMBLY BUILDINGS, CORNER OF TENTH AND CHESTNUT STREETS.—The apartments in these buildings were recently thrown open for the inspection of a large number of the ladies and gentlemen of this city. The rooms are beautiful. The basement is a restaurant, with every convenience; the second floor is the lofty and elegant ball-room, 135 by 30 feet, and 26 feet in height, the walls and ceiling beautifully ornamented, and the room ventilated by flues, which pass through open tubes to the roof, all of which may be opened or closed in a moment, by simply pulling a rope. The next is the banquetting-room, 65 feet long by 30 wide, similarly ventilated. In the third story, are two large exhibition-rooms, lighted by sky-lights, and well adapted for the exhibition of paintings. The whole building is a credit to the city.

James H. Farrand, Esq., 281 Chestnut Street, is the agent for the building. Application for the use of the rooms must be made to him.

THE IRVING HOUSE IN NEW YORK.—CHANGE OF PROPRIETORS.—Mr. D. D. Howard, who has made an independent fortune in this establishment, has retired; and we tender to him and his amiable lady many thanks for the many acts of kindness that we have received at their hands, and our sincere wishes that they may enjoy, in their retirement, every comfort that wealth can bestow! We also welcome the new-comer, Mr. W. H. Burroughs, formerly of this city. If anybody can supply Mr. Howard's place, he is the man, and we bespeak for Mr. B. a continuance of that patronage that the hotel has always enjoyed. We hope that our subscribers, visiting New York, will not fail to give Mr. B. a call. They may be sure of a hearty welcome, as they will go recommended by the "Lady's Book."

MERIT REWARDED.—Our esteemed correspondent, whose poetry has so often charmed the readers of the "Book," Anson G. Chester, Esq., of the "Buffalo Morning Express," has received the prize of one hundred dollars for the best poem to be spoken at the opening of the Buffalo Theatre.

WHY DO LADIES STARE AT EACH OTHER?—This question was seriously propounded to us a short time since by a respected bachelor friend, who, in truth, seemed to be greatly annoyed at the practice, and therefore greatly interested in having it satisfactorily accounted for. He appeared to think that such conduct, on the streets, evinced a vulgar amount of boldness, which he even went so far as to characterise as downright insolence and impudence. "Look," said he, "at some of our ladies of the first circles, in their promenades upon that great thoroughfare of pride and fashion, Chestnut Street! How haughtily, and with what contempt do they peer into the countenances, and how minutely do they scan the dresses of those who are equal to them in society, or above or below them in that respect! Did you ever observe," he continued, "how formally and imperiously they turn themselves round, as if deterred by no sense of modesty or propriety to take a second and a third view of each other, and as if determined to lose sight of nothing that might avail them in securing the least triumph of a most insolent curiosity? Men," said he, with increased emphasis, "are never guilty of such impertinence."

This is, indeed, a terrible denunciation against our fair friends, thought we, and, for a moment or two, we felt almost conscious that the petulant disclaimer was not altogether in error. There was no denying the fact. But how to satisfy him in regard to this innocent female propensity, as we knew it was, and which he had taken too much to heart, seemed at first beyond our humble powers of extenuation or apology. At length, however, somewhat recovering from his abruptness and severity, we said to him, calmly, "Perhaps it is all owing to their desire to know the fashions!" And, taking courage at this happy thought, we proceeded to illustrate it thus: "You, sir, mistake the whole matter. You think the ladies are staring into each other's faces. No such thing. They are only staring at each other's manner of dressing the hair—at each other's bonnets and trimmings; and, when they turn round to look after each other, it is not, as you suppose, to criticise the neatness and elegance of each other's person, but to assure themselves of the neatness, the elegance, and the appropriateness of the dresses worn by the fashionable passers-by, of whom, personally, it is probable they are far more indifferent than you really are, with all your pretensions to bachelorship."

"But what can be done," said our friend, after a pause, "to reform this apparently immodest and unmannerly practice? I say apparently unmannerly practice; for, with your explanation, I do not see that it is so very reprehensible, after all."

"Well," said we, with great good feeling and sincerity, "we think that the best method that could be devised to wean the ladies from a practice which has given you such unpleasant apprehensions, would be for yourself, and your numerous bachelor, fault-finding friends, to subscribe liberally for the 'Lady's Book,' and to distribute the numbers liberally among such of your female acquaintances as do not already take it, in order that they may see our fashion plates for every month, and read the instructions furnished by the editor of the fashionable department; and we warrant you they will no longer offend you by staring at the curls or the bonnets, the jewelry, the laces or the dresses of the ladies whom they casually meet upon the streets. No lady reader of the 'Lady's Book' was ever charged with any such impertinence. The fashions are furnished to them regularly from the best authority; and, therefore, having no cause to apprehend the least deficiency or impropriety in their own dresses, they never seek to compare them with the dresses of others."

Our friend was convinced; and, bachelor as he was, such was his detestation of the practice of staring, as he persisted in calling the habit, that he left us determined to raise a large club for the distribution of our excellent "Book," as he was pleased to compliment it.

WHAT BECOMES OF ALL THE CLEVER CHILDREN?—We once had the curiosity to ask what becomes of the plus, but, to this day, we have never received a satisfactory answer. We very much fear that a similar fate will attend our present inquiry, and that we shall never learn the truth about the clever children. It is Victor Hugo, we believe, who says that "to meet young couples, the 'unto us a child is born' seems something so astonishing and remarkable, that one would imagine they had never looked forward to it as a probable result of their union, nor even observed that their friends also had children. Every young father and mother look upon their 'first baby' as Adam and Eve must have looked upon Cain, with delight, wonder, and something of triumph in their own creative ingenuity. And it is a happy instinct which enables us to value these little prizes so highly; and a curious thing to reflect, as we stumble through the parks, knee deep in children, that there is not one little unit in those diminutive millions that has not—God bless it!—a circle of admiring relatives, to whom it is the prettiest, the dearest, the cleverest—in fact, the only child that ever was worth a thought."

Alas! what does become of all the prettiest, the dearest, the cleverest children that throng the world in their infancy, and who for a while are the delight and the joy of affectionate parents? We do not mean to push our inquiry in regard to those who have died before they attained the responsibilities of a half-awakened consciousness. It is only in regard to those who, in their earliest developments, promised to be the noblest, the brightest, the purest, the rarest in genius, in learning, in courage, and in renown, of all the other children that were ever born into the world. What has become of them? Who can tell? Where are the evidences of their existence among the crowds that pass us on the streets, or among the multitudes that people the world? How few! how far between!

ONE of the New York papers says: "The witty editor of the 'Mercury,' Mr. S. Nichols, who would be a man of mark among the keen epigrammatists of Paris, suggested, the other day, a capital idea for another, which he is capable of performing himself—to make a collection of specimens of American humor, and deliver them in the form of lectures." We bear witness to the wit and humor of Mr. Nichols. We know of but one other person that is as capable of the work, and that is Mr. Wm. E. Burton. Mr. B. is as amusing off the stage as he is on, a ripe scholar and a keen humorist. Such a series of lectures would be a rich treat.

SINGULAR ASSOCIATION.—We observe, in the last number of the "London Arts Union," the following advertisement: "The celebrated picture of the 'Sermon on the Mount' will be raffled for," &c.

A REASON FOR NOT LIKING STEP-FATHERS.—A little fellow once observed, "I do not like these new papas; they whip the old papas' children."

THE following are neat: A moneyed man's objection to stays—because they reduce the circulation.

NOVELTIES IN GOTHAM.

ONE of the cleverest women we know says that "traveling is to people what whiting is to silver," a proposition that is proved in everyday life. We shut ourselves up in a little world of our own, a good enough world in its way, with music and books, and elegant household pursuits, but, nevertheless, a world of routine, until we come to think our planet an entire paradise, and our sun the centre of the universe.

Alas for such a theory, when the enterprising traveller is suddenly set down, in the midst of busy, bustling Broadway! Be his name recorded on the books of the Irving, the Collamore, or the Metropolitan, the rubbing process has commenced—the whiting will very soon absorb the dull tarnish of retirement. One morning's walk will give more food for thought than a year of books.

THE NEW HOTELS

are just now the topic of conversation at all tables d'hôte. "[Fish, with oyster sauce, waiter.] Yes, I am told the Metropolitan has been full from the moment it was opened. I remember when the Astor, sir, was the ninth wonder of the world. I brought my wife down to see it. [The castor, boy.] Have you seen the St. Nicholas? Rubs the Metropolitan close, I am told. Splendid saloon! A three dollar house, though, must be exclusive." And then the bill of fare is studied, and bread crumbled while the courses are renewed, and the ancient chicken, who evidently has no relations in Bucks county, suggests Albion, who is discussed in turn.

The St. Nicholas—well named for the patron saint of Gotham—was not quite completed when its beauties were first displayed to us. But the classic dignity of the front, of purest marble; the broad entrance and lofty staircases, disfigured, as the last were, by scaffolding, gave full promise of the future. The walls and ceiling are delicately freecord, the cornices exquisitely carved. The dining-saloon is certainly the most beautiful room we have ever entered, for height, depth, and purity of coloring. We could not but congratulate the proprietor on the perfect taste shown throughout, which has by no means excluded any imaginable convenience or luxury. Those of our lady friends who dislike living in trunks will appreciate the beauty of abundant closet-room in each chamber, and Mrs. Butler might find "A Year of Consolation" under that hospitable roof, with every comfort which she so strenuously denies to American hotels.

If our readers are like ourselves, they will not hesitate to stop by one of the lace-curtained windows opening into the hall, and take a peep

BEHIND THE SCENES.

A perfect fairy-land of a saloon opens a vista before us, lined with magnificent mirrors, perfumed with a thousand extracts, scented waters, and impalpable odors that are used for no lady's boudoir, but are here wasted upon the sterner sex, so called. There they are, leaning back in the most luxurious faueteils that can be desired, calmly resigned to the hands of the operator, their faces already "smothered in cream," which the sharp glancing steel is as quickly removing. "Not to put too fine a point upon it," as our friend Tungus would say, they are enjoying the luxury of "a shave," not in Wall street parlance; and, looking unobserved on the placid content beaming through their half-closed eyes, we for the first time decided that the beard might be considered in the light of a luxury. "What can a Turkish bath offer surpassing Phalon!" a Gothamite might indignantly inquire of an Oriental traveller. But, while our gentlemanly escorts are transfixed by the novelty which makes to them such forcible appeals, we have strolled through the still more dazzling beauties of Alcock & Allen's, glittering with silver and crystal, and have even arrived at "Haughwout & Dailey's"

MANUFACTORY OF PORCELAIN,

before they join us. We have come here because we never have known, until a moment ago, that painting on porcelain was carried on to any extent in this country, and our most obliging and thoughtful guide has proposed our stopping to see the mysterious process on our way to the Metropolitan, almost "over the way" from its fair rival, the St. Nicholas.

The huge windows are glittering with fine dinner and tea services, displayed in most tempting array; and we pass by cabinets filled with far more costly products—delicate vases, lifelike statuettes, in porcelain and Parian—to the room beyond, where the musical murmur of the pendants to innumerable chandeliers reminds us of our own Cornelius, from whose celebrated manufactory they have indeed been sent. The second story is similarly occupied; but onward, and upward still, we come to the working-room, where twenty or thirty men are silently occupied in their graceful employment. The plain white surface of a fruit dish, for instance, is to receive bands of gilding. It is placed on a little stand that revolves slowly before the workman, who traces the lines with his pencil dipped in what we should say was excellent liquid blacking, but which is in reality pulverized gold, mixed with oil and turpentine. The furnace heat to which it is then subjected dries out the mixture, leaving only the dull, whitish-yellow gold, which must be subjected to the process of burnishing before its full beauty can be seen. Side by side, we see an artist with an enormous vase before him, on which he is painting, as delicately as if it were an ivory plate, an exquisite woodland scene—a young girl crossing a brook, and pausing midway, with the water gurgling over the stones at her feet. He has been already four weeks at this single picture, so that the worth of this one piece of porcelain may be calculated. Still above, in a gallery running round three sides of a lofty room, we find women, and even little girls, busily employed in burnishing. This is a simple process, but producing a wondrous effect, in "gilding the refined gold." At first sight, it would seem that each operator, for the love of destruction simply, was occupied in rubbing and scratching off the golden bands, leaves, or figures with which the vase or cup at which they are at work is decorated. But we find the small knife or chisel does just its appropriate task, and no more, removing only the dull surface rapidly and skilfully. The little girls of ten years old are working away as demurely and industriously as if they knew the worth of all their earnings—which doubtless they do, poor things! We should like to transcribe the interesting information with regard to this branch of manufacture, for which we are indebted to the kind politeness of Mr. Haughwout, and to speak of the process more minutely; but the morning wanes away apace, and we shall not have time for the "Metropolitan," if we linger longer where piles of China are being manufactured for the St. Nicholas, as the curious traveller can see the very plates he is to eat from when he patronizes that palace-like hotel. So, stopping to overlook for a moment a workman in still another room, who is engraving a crest upon a set of crystal just ordered, we bid our pleasant conductor "good-morning," and cross Broadway to

THE METROPOLITAN.

Strange as it may at first seem, this mammoth hotel is on the "shilling," that is to say, on the unfashionable side of Broadway. Many of our readers remember the situation of "Niblo's," that theatre which is not a theatre, if the paradox can be made out, where they have passed many a pleasant evening. The Metropolitan extends nearly a whole block, directly in front of the gardens, its long corridors opening upon them on the one side, and into beautiful parlors and suites of rooms on the other. No more enchanting scene can be imagined than these corridors brilliantly lighted by enormous chandeliers, foliage waving by the open windows, and beautifully dressed women leisurely pacing to the softened music of some delicious overture. We like the plan of a suite of public drawing-rooms, instead of one huge apartment, where each party can scan their neighbors, and overhear every word of a conversation. Nothing but a ladies' reading-room could be added to the attractions of this luxurious hotel. The children's dining-room is a novelty; it is as large and well arranged as the ladies' ordinary of most hotels, and given up entirely to the children and their nurses. Once a week "a hop" is given to them, a grown-up fashion whose wisdom we leave our readers to decide upon.

The regular dining-room of the house surpasses our descriptive powers; nor dare we venture to disclose the beauty of decoration which distinguishes the suite of bridal apartments—a fashion, by the way, that has too much of vulgar notoriety to be especially commended. Enough that the state chamber of an European palace can scarcely surpass them in splendor and Oriental luxury. Verily, we live in a wonderful age. But we do not quarrel with beauty, in any shape in which it may present itself, when open to all. Though our hotels are palaces, a passing residence in them will not injure the taste of the traveller, who may take with him, to his plainer home, pleasant and wonderful memories. If the people of this country are "all sovereigns," who could more worthily fill them?

LESSONS OF SOCIETY.

It is often a matter of notice among travellers, that an American girl sees as much of society before coming out as after. At no period beyond pantalettes does the school-room wholly obscure the parlor; and any one knows that with so many buds it is rare to find a full-blown rose. Sanderson, that cleverest of all travellers who have ever attempted to sketch society, has an "apple of gold" on this point which ought not to be suffered to remain ungathered. Writing from Paris, he says:—

"As long as college beaux and boarding-school misses take the lead, it must be an insipid society in whatever community it may exist. Middle age in this country never loses its sovereignty, nor does old age lose its respect; and this respect, with the enjoyments which accompany it, keeps the world young. It turns the clouds into drapery, and gilds them with its sunshine, which presents as fine a prospect as the clear and starry heavens. Even time seems to fall in with the general observance. I know French women who retain to forty-five, and even beyond it, the most agreeable attractions of their sex. Is it not villanous in you of Philadelphia to lay us, before we have lived half our time out, upon the shelf? Some of our native tribes, more merciful, eat their old folks out of the way. Don't grow angry, young ladies—you will one day be as old as your mothers.

"An important item of a lady's studies in Paris (and it should be a leading branch of education everywhere) is her beauty. Sentiment and health being the two chief ingredients and efficient causes of this quality, have each its proper degree of cultivation. Everybody knows that the expression of the eye, that the voice, that the whole physiognomy is modified by the thoughts and passions habitually entertained in the mind. Every one sees their effect upon the face of the philosopher and the idiot, the generous man and the niggard. Give, for example, any woman a habit of self-complacency, and she will have a little pursed-up mouth; or, give her a prying and busy disposition, and she will have a straight onward nose. This is not forgotten in the education of the Parisian ladies—they take care that while young and tender they may cherish honest and amiable feelings."

OUR CORRESPONDENTS.

THE music referred to in our last number can be procured at Couenhoven's, or any of the principal music stores in Philadelphia. The sheets can easily be sent by mail, at a very small charge, with the present rates of postage. There are two new songs by Wallace, who is the author of the "Cradle Song," as our correspondent supposed. They are published in New York, but may be had in any of our larger cities. The "Glendon Polka," by Dodworth, is a great favorite at socials; the "Home Schottisch," introducing "Old Folks at Home," and the "Grace Schottisch," by Dodworth, are also in much demand.

S. L. B. is quite right in thinking that a black dress diminishes the figure. A too looks much smaller in a black boot; a hand in a dark glove. Albion, whose figure is enormous, has the taste and good sense to adopt this well-known rule in dress. Black brocaded silks are her favorite style, with crimson flowers, roses, or scarlet pomegranates; and magnificent diamonds her sole ornaments. Her dark hair is cut close, and admits of no decoration.

Certainly, if our little friend "Elsie" cannot afford pictures, we advise well chosen prints as an admirable substitute. "The Rendezvous" is very graceful, and though it has been reproduced in so many forms, has not lost its beauty. We have seen the one she mentions of John Bunyan in Bedford Jail. It is a beautiful scene, and fully worthy to be an accompaniment to the treasured volume which the "Pilgrim's Progress" has become in almost every family. A parlor may be made much more cheerful by a few good prints, in neat and simple frames, than by the gaudiest wall paper that ever was designed.

We believe the getting up of rich laces to look like new is in part a secret. We have seen Valenciennes and Mechlin, done by Madame Humbert, of this city, that could not be told from that just purchased. It is well worth the price charged, which at first seems extravagant; for lace badly washed loses its beauty at once. "Nora" can have it attended to by the editress of the fashion department, and we do not think there would be any difficulty in having it sent by mail.

We will get the directions for the "Hour-glass Table," and forward to Mrs. B.

For Aprons, Miss B. L. will see our present gossip.

The "Indestructible Spelling-Book" is certainly a comfort to mothers: it is printed on strong linen cloth, that cannot be torn, yet is beautifully clear and white: can also be sent by mail to "The Evergreens."

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

Having had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editress of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Bridal wardrobes, spring and autumn bonnets, dresses, jewelry, bridal cards, cake-boxes, envelopes, etc. etc., will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq., who will be responsible for the amount, and the early execution of commissions.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Levy's or Stewart's, bonnets from Miss Wharton's, jewelry from Bailey's, Warden's, Philadelphia, or Tiffany's, New York, if requested.

DESCRIPTION OF THE FASHION PLATE.

Fig. 1st.—Evening dress of pale violet silk, opening to show a jeupe and corsage of fine cambric. The trimming consists of three narrow puffs of ribbon, the centre white: the outside rows correspond to the violet shade. Bars of the same cross the bust. Sleeve demi long, very open, and trimmed to correspond. A double fall of rich lace makes the undersleeve. Head-dress of lace and knots of pale pink ribbon.

Fig. 2d.—Dinner dress of cambric, the skirt consisting entirely of seven flounces, superbly embroidered, the top one being gathered in at the waist. Gold corsage of green watered silk, a close fitting and novel style, without a basque; buttons in imitation of emeralds. Opera cloak of straw-colored cashmere, a very pale hue. The hood is of a fine shade of rose-colored silk, lying on the shoulder. It is lined with the same. Hair dressed in bandeaux of Grecian braids—a classical and favorite style; the front braid forming a coronet above the forehead.

CHITCHAT ON PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.

We have given in our late number so many directions for cloaks, that in the month for their adoption little remains to be said. Stewart's rooms exhibit an infinite variety in shade, shape, and material; the most costly being of velvet, lined, or trimmed with fur, and at prices attainable only by the wife or daughters of a millionaire. At least, no one whose income is not almost incalculable, ought to dream for an instant of spending six hundred or a thousand dollars on a single garment.

One of the prettiest novelties formed a close vest corsage in front, fitting to the figure by means of a laced cape, beneath a flowing cape, which falls over the shoulders and arms, in graceful outline. This was of cloth, a pale fawn shade, embroidered with silk a little deeper in hue; the moderate price fifty dollars. Other cloth and merino cloaks were distinguished by the trimming being placed lengthwise of the cape, so as to cut it in quarters—as you would mark the skin of an orange to peel it—instead of encircling the cape, as heretofore.

Velvet ribbon of every shade, width, and quality is employed in the trimming of bonnets, caps, headresses, dresses, capes, cloaks, etc. It is put to every use to which gimp has been heretofore applied. For shaded silks the velvet is also shaded; and if put on in many rows, the width is almost always graduated. Bunches, not rosettes, of velvet bows are worn in the hair for dinner and evening dress; black or brown is the most usual color, but deep blue, and even pink mixed with black is often seen. It is the simplest style of headress that can be worn, and almost universally becoming, unless too many pendent ends are worn for a short figure. We have seen a dark gray silk, trimmed with black velvet ribbon, five rows placed closely at the neck, but widening over the bust, an inch apart. They are narrowed into a point, at the waist, and then widened as they encircle the basque. The sleeves had a deep cuff, opening on the top of the arm, also with five rows of the narrow velvet.

Also a cape, suitable for evening dress in half mourning, and very simple. A pelerine of ordinary white lace, round on the back, and descending half way to the waist; in front it is pointed, and falls below it. This has several rows of black velvet ribbon, not quite half an inch in width, which contrasts beautifully with a delicate complexion. But we might multiply examples of the immoderate use of velvet ribbon infinitely, and now have a succession of novelties to present.

Remembering our promise to give the variations of nursery fashions, we have consulted the oracle of Gotham in that particular, for, not satisfied in being first "in the heads of his countrymen," Mr. Genin, well known to our readers, has opened, in one of the fine saloons beneath the St. Nicholas Hotel, a magazine of all that can belong to a child's toilet, most of the articles being imported directly from London or Paris. It is called "Genin's Bazaar," and is well worth a visit from any stranger in town, whether intending to purchase or not; they will be just as politely received, and shown all that is new and curious. It is the refinement of shopkeeping, the elegant decorations, the comfortable divans and lounges inviting one from the glare and crowd of Broadway. And here we ensconced ourself, and, from "the loopholes of our retreat," surveyed at leisure the novel appointments, and the kaleidoscope crowd.

"Oh! mamma, mamma, see this beautiful little girl in her glass house! it is Julia, mamma, isn't it?" shouted a little child, clapping her hands at the elegantly dressed wax model at the door: "oh, come in, mamma!" and in mamma came, led by the young tyrant and her little brothers. "Mamma" passes by the cases of boys' hats and caps in infinite variety, the tempting stands of miniature canes and French parasols, and the children rush to the cut-glass fountain, nearly twice as tall as their conductor, in whose sparkling vase the gold-fish are contentedly basking. It is the first one ever manufactured in this country, and was got up by Mr. Genin himself at a great expense, for the amusement of the little people, and the admiration of their elders and betters. It is placed in the centre of the store, directly beneath a fine dome of brilliantly colored glass, which admits light to the children's department immediately below, the circular chasm being surrounded by a light and graceful railing. Beautiful grandioles, supported by tall cut-glass pedestals, are also stationed here; and on either side are "model young gentlemen," in their "glass houses," which would entirely preclude the juvenile amusement of "throwing stones," were they not inanimate. And here "mamma" pauses, while "Harry" is taken in hand. "Don't you see, Harry, this little boy has his cuffs turned down, just as I desired you to wear yours? There, so!"—and Master Harry's sleeves, neck-tie, and hair, are rearranged by this "glass of fashion." Their mamma must have a pair of boots herself, and here they are to be found, behind this fanciful screen, where we have ensconced ourselves. Dainty French boots, and slippers of every hue and form; quilted breakfast shoes, and even "ladies' Wellingtons," a new article, which Mr. Genin conscientiously urges upon our ladies as the best preservative of health in our changeful climate. Imagine that your brothers can wear delicately made French morecos "threes" with heels to them, and their boots show forth the "ladies' Wellingtons."

"Bonnets? certainly, madam, this way;" and we follow with our eyes to see the niche devoted to millinery for ladies and children, also prettily adorned, and well filled. The fur department is near, and here we find the new shapes of victorines, cuffs, and muffs which it includes. Ermine is decidedly to be the fur of the season; it is more reasonable in price than it has ever been before, and is elegantly lined with quilted white satin. Muffs are not generally carried, and are much smaller than heretofore. Fur cuffs are still a prevailing style; at least so say Mr. Genin's handboxes. And now descending to the cabin, as it were, by a short flight of steps, we come to the children's department, where every style of nursery wardrobe can be procured. Here again we meet Master Harry and his mamma, and here are every variety of children, from babies with their long robes sweeping over their nurses' arms, who have come to be fitted to one of those daintily embroidered bonnets, to the little girl of twelve, surveying a new walking dress with unmistakable admiration. Nor must we fail to remark upon the busy lady looking at everything with a view to "the pattern," and not to purchase, who informs her companion in an aside, that "really that saque puzzles her, and she shall be obliged to bring her seamstress to help her make it out." But of children's fashions, more in our next number.

Postage on the LADY'S BOOK only Two cents each number, if it is paid for three numbers in advance.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK!
THE PIONEER MAGAZINE. NEW VOL., XLVI.
LITERARY AND PICTORIAL.

THE BOOK OF THE NATION AND ARTS UNION OF AMERICA!!

Immense increase of reading matter without reducing the number of full page Steel engravings.

It is useless for the publisher of GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK to make any great parade of what he intends to do. The work has been before the public for twenty-three years, and it is a well-known fact that the latter numbers of a year are always superior to the commencing ones, as he improves with the expense which each month brings him, seizing every new feature of the day and imparting it to his subscribers through the successive numbers of the book.

Nothing but real worth in a publication could be the cause of so prolonged an existence, especially in the literary world, where everything is so evanescent. Hundreds of magazines have been started, and, after a short life, have departed—while the "Lady's Book" alone stands triumphant, a proud monument reared by the Ladies of America as a testimony of their own worth.

Many persons, who seek no further than our title, presume that the "Lady's Book" is intended merely for the amusement of a class, and that it does not enter into the discussion of those more important questions connected with the realities and the duties of life which every well-informed woman, mother and daughter, should be acquainted with. But such is not the fact. It is now, as it has ever been, our constant care to combine, in the pages of the "Lady's Book," whatever is useful, whatever is elevating, whatever is pure, dignified, and virtuous in sentiment, with whatever may afford rational and innocent amusement.

The expense of one number of the "Lady's Book," including steel engravings and literary matter, paid for, not taken from English magazines, far exceeds that of any other magazine published in this country. We make no exception, and are willing to have the fact tested.

CODEY'S SPLENDID ENGRAVINGS ON STEEL.

Remember that Godey gives more than four times as many Steel Engravings monthly as any other Magazine.

It is the fashion with many magazines to announce in their advertisements, "Splendid Engravings, Fashion Plates," &c. What is the disappointment of the duped subscriber when he receives the numbers of a magazine thus advertised, to find all his splendid engravings dwindled down to paltry wood-cuts—as contemptible in design as in execution!

The publisher of the "Lady's Book" performs all he promises, and, as some of our exchanges are kind enough to say, "more than he promises." Each number of the "Lady's Book" contains at least either in LINE, STIPPLE, or MEZZOTINT, and sometimes FOUR.
